How great are the responsibilities of housekeepers! Sometimes an indigestible ticle of food, by its effects upon a king, overturns an empire. A FEMALE POISONER.

The First Woman Hanged in Manchester, England.

On a recent Monday morning the sentence of death passed on Mary Ann Britland, factory operative, of Aston under Lyne, for poisoning Mrs. Dixon, wife of Thomas Dixon, was carried out at the Strangeways gaol, Manchester. In her last hours the prisoner was very much excited. She ate scarcely anything on Sunday night, and at midnight and during the small hours of Monday morning she was heard moaning heavily and singing snatches of hymns. In the morning, when the warders entered the cell to prepare her for execution she looked wearied and excited, and she had no appetite for such refreshments as were offered to her. With as little delay as possible the executioner, Berry, of Bradford, had her pinioned, and the customary procession started for the scaffold, which is erected on the south-west corner of the prison. Heading the procession came the prison chaplain, reading the prayers. He was followed by the prisoner, supported by two female warders, with two male warders in the rear. As the procession left the cell in which the prisoner had been confined, one of the warders took up a position on the roadway a short distance from the scaffold, in order to see that the sentence was properly carried into effect. A little further away stood the representatives of the press. Save the tolling of the prison bell and the screaming of the poor woman, who was being led to execution, nothing was seen or heard for a minute or two by those who were waiting. As the procession

APPROACHED THE SCAFFOLD

the voice of the chaplain was drowned by the prisoner's appeals to God for mercy. "Oh, Lord have mercy!" "Oh, forgive me, forgive me!' She cried piteously. A few minutes sufficed to bring the procession along the covered way connecting the cells with the scaffold, and the prisoner, who looked thin and pale, was still shrieking with such voice as was left to her. It was feared there would soon be a scene on the scaffold, but it was not so. As soon as the prisoner had been placed under the beam her face covered in the usual manner, the rope was put round her neck, and at a given signal from the executioner, the two female warders let go their hold of the prisoner. The bolt was then drawn, and in an instant the woman was hanging at the end of the rope dead. The length of the rope was seven feet. The length of the drop was seven feet. The hoisting of the black flag informed the crowd outside that the prisoner had suffered the last penalty of the law.

STORY OF THE CRIME.

The crime for which Mrs. Britland has paid the full penalty of the law was of a very extraordinary character. At the beginning of the year she resided at Ashton with her husband and two grown up daughters, and near them lived Thomas Dixon and his wife. A close intimacy seemed to exist between the two families, and Mrs. Britland was often seen in the company of Dixon, and on one occasion went on a journey to Oldham in his company. In March last Mrs. Britland's daughter, who was engaged to be married, became suddenly ill, and died in great agony. Early in May Mrs. Britland's husband died under similar circumstances, and a fortnight later Mrs. Dixon suddenly became ill and succumbed. Various rumors were circulated, and on the police making enquiries they found Mrs. Britland had been a frequent purchaser of "mouse powder." The symptoms before death and an investigation of the bodies of the deceased led to the belief that they had been poisoned. After the death of Mrs. Dixon, Mrs. Britland seems to have been greatly alarmed, and in a conversation with Mr. Law, a coffee tavern keeper, asked him "If they could tell if a person had been poisoned?" and "If they could discover if the person had mouse powder?" The police apprehended Mrs. Britland, and also Thomas Dixon, the husband of the deceased woman, but Dixon was subsequently discharged. When being sentenced to death, Mrs. Britland strongly protested her innocence, and said she had not given poison to Mrs. Dixon.

FOR THE THOUGHTFUL.

Religion is our life, being essential to our peace of mind, our support under the trials of life, and our fitness for the eternal world.

We ought not to look back, unless it is to derive useful lessons from past errors and for the purpose of profiting by dear-bought experience.

Unless we are prepared to assert that all goodness culminates in ourselves and recedes from others in exact proportion to their distance from us, we must admit that our feelings are large factors of injustice in the judgment that we are all of us only too ready to form.

Few companions are more delightful, as few also are more rare, than a sympathetic person. So many good qualities make up the ideal sympathetic nature—tact, unselfishness, a knowledge of many subjects—that it is not wonderful that such gifted persons should be the exceptions, not the rule.

Trials of every kind may await you, sterner and darker than any yet experienced. Do not anticipate them, but do not forget their possibility. Do not, as you prize your own soul, forget that your strength for every conflict depends on your being girded for each as it comes, and never being careless or weary.

If we find that our time passes slowly and heavily, we may be sure there is something wrong within. Either we have not enough to do or we work mechanically without heart or energy. If past time looks short and empty, it is because it lacks a distinct record of noble aims, definite resolves, worthy endeavours; if the immediate future looks tedious and uninteresting, it is because we are not living full, rich, and earnest lives.

The farmer knows he cannot change the species of the seed and make rye yield wheat or barley oats; but he also knows that he can bring many influences to bear upon the growth of each plant after its kind—that he can so accommodate its relations to sun, air, water, and soil as to ensure its better development or to stunt and impoverish it. So, if we learn the true lesson of heredity, we shall know that human tendencies, real and actual as they are, depend for their development largely upon the way they are treated.

THE WORLD OVER.

Farmer Taft, of Uxbridge, Mass., has a pair of steers which he drives to harness, and which have trotted, with four in the carriage, four miles in half an hour.

A threatening storm cloud alarmed the worshippers at a colored camp meeting at Green Camp, Ohio, on Sunday, and in their hurry to get away thirty-two buggies were totally wrecked.

Mme. Gudden, the widow of Dr. Gudden, who has recently been given £10,000 by the Bavarian Government, is an authoress of children's stories, and herself has eleven children.

Sir William Armstrong & Co. have just obtain a very large contract for the supply of their guns to the Chinese Government. They are wanted for the new fortifications of Formosa.

A Rondout couple who have been on a spree for three weeks have in that time pawned every article of furniture in their rooms, and, if they do not die of delirium tremens, will be sent to the almshouse.

A Georgia farmer has a goat that joins gleefully with a hound in hunting rabbits. When on the trail he imitates the dogs and runs with his nose to the ground, but when the quarry is in view up go head and tail, and he dashes after the unfortunate bunny regardless of his companions.

Lake Elsinore—a body of water seven miles long, three wide, and eighty feet deep—is between Los Angeles and San Diego, Cal. A city is growing up all around it, and steamboats make regular trips along the shore, and people can go from street to street by water in a charmingly Venician manner.

How many people have any idea of the enormous capital invested in British railways? The railway returns just issued show that there was open for traffic at the end of last year 19,169 miles of railway, that the capital authorized in railway stock is £927,750,000, and the capital actually paid up £815,858,955. The total receipts from traffic were £66,644,967.

Droitwich Church, which is one of the oldest in England, is to be pulled down, as a recent subsidence in the ground has caused the building to become undermined. This is the effect of the pumping for brine, which has so seriously depressed the soil in and about Droitwich. The fine old tower of the church is of quite unknown age. It escaped the great fire of 1293, which destroyed most of the body of the structure.

During a railroad excursion from Lafayettte, Ind., to Dayton, O., the other day, the train was stopped as it crossed the State line, and David Clark alighting stood in Indiana, and Mrs. Mary Hawkins stood in Ohio, and a minister who was present straddled the line and married them; and then the 800 excursionists formed a circle around the pair and gave them three cheers while the band played.

Helen H. Blanchard, the daughter of an unsuccessful Portland merchant, failed as a boarding house keeper in Boston, then barely kept soul and body together by running a sewing machine in a Philadelphia clothing house, and then invented an over seam stitch, and a patent sweat band for men's hats, and with the money from these successful inventions has bought back the old Maine homestead, where the family lived in the prosperous days of the past.

Henry Donnelly of New Haven heard cries for help coming from Mill River, ran quite a distance at full speed, reached the water in time to see a small boy sink for the third time, plunged in breathless as he was, without removing even his shoes, failed to get the boy at the first attempt, dived again, and just managed to bear the apparently lifeless body ashore when his strength gave out. Donnelly was dragged out fainting, the boy was resuscitated, and so was his mother, who had in the mean time arrived and fainted.

Another mouse that sings like a canary is reported. This little fellow was captured by Dr. Caldwell of Santa Rosa, Cal., who found it in a wire trap singing blithely. He kept it for several weeks and then released it, but the next morning it was in the trap again. Again he let it go, and again it came back; and now mouse goes in the trap each night and is released each morning. When it sings it sits on its hind legs and moves its head and throat like a canary. Its song is rather sweeter than the ordinary canary's.

The Traveller tells of an Arkansas mother who never has trouble giving her children medicine. "When I want Tom to take castor oil," say she, "I pour some in a glass and say, 'Here, Tom, drink this; but you needn't ask for any more.' He drinks it right down and always asks for more." It was on this same principle that a farmer induced his cattle to eat buckwheat straw. He built a low fence around the stack and once, or twice a day clubbed the cattle away. The straw was all gone by spring.

In spite of all partial repairs, St. Mark's Cathedral at Venice is slowly sinking into the mud of the lagoons. The tide ebbs and flows up under the great dome, and the other day the water was standing on the floor of the crypt, which was walled in and cemented only a few years ago, it was hoped impermeably. The earth on which the church stands is being slowly washed out by the flow and ebb, and the foundations of the church are unequally subsiding.

The great meteorological observatory on the summit of Sonnblick, 10,177 feet above the sea, and the highest in Europe, is now in operation. The view from the summit is magnificent, ranging over a great part of the Tyrol, Carinthia, and Salzburg. The roof is of copper, chiefly on account of its electrical advantages. The situation is very exposed, and is a sort of centre for the discharge of electrical disturbances. Telegraphic communication is maintained with the central office at Vienna.

Ida Granrath, a pretty little fourteen-year-old daughter of a St. Louis boarding house keeper, fell heels over head in love with big Anton Pierre, the Canadian wrestler, who boarded at her father's house. The brawny athlete had no idea that he had made such a conquest until he was about to quit St. Louis, when the girl weeping, begged him to take her with him. He said that he could not, because he had no money; so a few days afterward she stole $400 of her father's money and set out to find Anton. Her father caught her at Indianapolis and took her home, but she says that she will yet go to the man she loves.

A Young Leader.

At a time when old men are pre-eminent in European councils the advance of a young man to the front rank of British party leaders is worthy of notice. Says the "St. James Gazette:"

Lord Randolph Churchill is the youngest leader that the House of Commons has had since the days of Pitt, who first accepted the post at the age of twenty-three. Peel was called to the same responsibility at forty, Russell at forty-two, Disraeli at forty-seven, Palmerston at seventy. Happily the nation is unfettered by any hard and-fast rule of age in respect to such appointments. Had Lord Randolph been a citizen of Republican Rome, he must have waited another six years to be legally eligible for the consulship. Under the French constitution of 1875 he could not be chosen a senator for three years to come. On the other hand, he has added two years to the thirty-five which an American must have lived before he can hold the presidency of the United States. No doubt a majority of the men who have made history had shown the measure of their capacity at thirty-seven. Bismarck was just thirth-six when be became minister at Frankfort, and his aggressive personality began to assert itself. Gambetta entered on his thirty-third year the acknowledged dictator of France outside Paris. Gordon had just completed the third decade of his life when he assumed the command of the "ever-victorious" army.

A True Dog Story.

Last year a clergyman of Norfolk, England, missed his pet dog, and there was much grief in the family, for Rough, the lost collie, was a favorite with the grown folks as well as with the children. Some nine months later the clergyman happening to go to Cattle Hill, where the drovers were, saw Rough, and joyously laid claim to him; but Rough's new master, a drover, refused to give the dog up, and there was a dispute. Of course the drovers were in sympathy with their fellow, and the clergyman found the odds against him. The drover said that he had owned Rough for years; the minister held to it that Rough was the very Rough he had raised. Two policemen came running up, and the case was stated. "But how can you prove ownership?" asked one of the officers. That put the minister in mind of something. He thrust his hand into a pocket, pulled out a penny, and gave it to the dog with the command, "Rough, fetch a loaf." Rough, with the penny in his mouth, went to the nearest bakery, made it clear that he wanted some bread, and soon came trotting back to the crowd. The clergyman broke off a morsel, gave it to Rough, and stood by while the dog munched it. Suddenly the clergyman exclaimed, "Rough, I believe that bread is poisoned!" Out the dog spat the piece of bread, and the crowd cried "Bravo!" There was no longer doubt as to the true ownership, and to the shame of the drover the dog trotted off at the minister's heels.

When William Dies.

Those who believe that a great European war will follow the death of the Emperor William find additional ground for their belief in the activity which the great Powers are displaying in the re-armament of their troops. Special attention is being paid to the military arm, and the single breech is being gradually superseded by the repeating or magazine rifle. Not long ago a sensation was caused by a celebration at the Spandau armory over the completion of the last of the 100,000 repeating rifles for German troops. During the summer 2,200 men have been employed at Erfurth, Spandau and elsewhere in converting the Mauser rifle into a repeating arm, at the rate of 1,200 daily. It is announced also that by this time 60,000 repeaters are in the hands of French troops, and a French paper says that the conversion of the two hundred thousandth French rifle will be duly celebrated. Austria is substituting the Mannlieber rifle, with a detachable magazine, for her Wanolgun. Norway and Sweden have the Jarmann magazine rifle, with a very long range, and Italy and Switzerland have the Vetterli rifle, of similar pattern. The expense of such a change is enormous, and its significance is only too apparent.

Playing Dead in Earnest.

It is related that Peter the Great, strolling incognito through the camp, came upon a party of men commissioned officers and grenadiers enacting a comedy. All at once his brow became clouded. In the place a soldier, in the uniform of his guard, commits at a certain moment a robbery. Nevertheless he allowed the play to proceed. The court-martial is summoned on the stage and the thief is sentenced to death. The spectators, composed of officers and men, showed the most lively concern in the performance, and laughed at the grotesque contortions of the condemned culprit. The amateur actor played his part very well. Here came the squad that is to execute him. "Fire!" orders the lieutenant, and the amateur dropped down dead, his heart pierced by seven bullets. No make believe, but dead indeed. Whereupon the Emperor dropped his incognito and addressed those assembled: "A soldier of my guard who committed a robbery must die. If he did not steal why did he boast of it and soil his uniform? It is I who ordered the loaded rifles given to the men. I henceforth forbid my soldiers to ply the trade of mummers."

An Hour that Repaid.

"Yes, mamma, industry shall be my bread and attention my butter," so said the boy Macaulay. In childhood he often made remarks like this. One day, when visiting a lady, a servant spilled some hot coffee over his legs. The lady took him on her lap, comforted him, and asked him how he felt. "Thank you, madam," said the boy, four years of age; "the agony is abated." In dealing with this child, Zachary Macaulay, his father, acted up faithfully to the best light he had. He made it a rule not to praise his youthful wisdom, not to notice his smart replies, and in other ways to check that tendency to arrogance which is the great danger of boys and men who have exceptional power over words.

Zachary Macaulay spent forty years of his life in assisting to bring his country to the point of abolishing slavery. He worked in co-operation with Wilberforce, Babington and their circle, and did as much in the cause as the best of them. He sacrificed to it health, fortune and pleasure; his business dwindled and perished through his devotion to it, and he died poor and dependent.

But there came an hour of repayment. He had the pleasure of hearing his son eloquently advocate the cause on the platform and in the House of Commons, and saw at length the principle incorporated in the British Constitution, that no slave can live upon any soil over which the flag of Britain floats.

The excellent biographer of Lord Macaulay, Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, is of opinion that the happiest half-hour of Zachary Macaulay's life was when he heard his gifted son make his maiden speech on the platform of an anti-slavery meeting, a speech was perhaps never surpassed by an orator who was addressing an audience for the first time. One passage called forth "a whirlwind of cheers."

"The hour is at hand when the peasant of the Antilles will no longer crawl in listless and trembling dejection round a plantation from whose fruits he must derive no advantage, and a hut whose door yields him no protection; but when his cheerful and voluntary labor is performed, he will return with the firm step and erect brow of a British citizen from the field, which is his freehold, to his cottage, which is his castle."

These words, delivered with the calm, robust power of the young Macaulay, thrill the father's heart.

The next speaker was Mr. Wilberforce, who alluded to the presence of his ancient ally on an occasion of so much interest to him, both as a father and as a citizen.

"My friend," said Mr. Wilberforce, "would doubtless willingly bear with all the base falsehoods, all the vile calumnies, all the detestable artifices, which have been aimed at him, to render him the victim and martyr of our cause, for the gratification he has this day enjoyed in hearing one so dear to him plead such a cause in such a manner."

The old man, true to his old-fashioned principle of concealing from his boy the pride and joy he felt in him, sat motionless during the speech, with his eyes fixed upon a piece of paper held as if he meant to take notes.

In talking to his son in the evening, he made only one slight allusion to the scene of the afternoon, when he remarked that it was unbecoming in so young a man to speak with folded arms in the presence of the royal prince who had presided.

Zachary Macaulay lived until 1838, long enough to see his son the foremost young man of his time. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Upon his monument he is described as one who worked forty years against slavery, and "resigned to others the praise and the reward."

There are hours that crown life's efforts. It came to the father in the son in this case, and happy is the father to whom the son brings the crown.

Buried for Four Hours.

Frank Mauzhardt, a resident of Carbondale, Ill., met with a most extraordinary adventure on Friday last. He was engaged in walling up a well he had just dug on the farm of Capt. J. C. Scott, a short distance east of that place. He had laid up the wall to within a few feet of the top of the well, but was at the bottom of the well for some purpose; all of a sudden the bricks began caving in at his feet, and the entire wall settled downward and began tumbling in. No help was at hand. Mauzhardt tried to extricate himself by climbing up on the brick as fast as they fell, and in this way elevated himself some five or six feet. The brick fell faster and faster, and at last he was caught and held fast. The brick then covered him up for a distance of ten feet. As soon as the accident was discovered workmen went to his relief. They called to him and received answers. The work of removing the brick continued over four hours. At last the man was uncovered. He was standing upright. One arm extended, the other raised above his head. He was wedged in so tightly that he could not move. The most singular part of the mishap was that he was comparatively uninjured. A slight bruise on his face and a little knot on his head was the only damage. The workmen releasing him encouraged him all they could, and he kept urging them to work hard. He says that his sensations during the four and one-half hours' imprisonment were peculiar beyond imagination, but that he was not unconscious for a moment.

Just Like Mamma

If mothers could always realize the ideals they represent to their children, they would be greatly encouraged in their arduous duties. A lady riding in a street car saw a little boy whom she knew.

"So you have a little sister, Willie," she remarked pleasantly. "Is she a pretty baby?"

"She looks just like mamma," was the smiling answer.

"What do you call her?" asked the lady.

"She's named after mamma," answered the little fellow promptly.

Everybody was smiling, and to relieve the lady's embarrassment, her friend enquired the color of the baby's hair.

"It's the same color as mamma's," he responded timidly.

A gentleman who had been amused by the dialogue asked the wee man if the new little sister was a good baby.

"Yes, sir," was the prompt reply. "She is just like mamma."

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

There is perhaps no public interest of greater importance to the rising generation and future of our country than education; and there is no country on the face of the globe which enjoys a better Public School System than this Canada of ours: nevertheless, how often do we find that the majority of parents are, in a great measure ignorant of the (often) hampered, ill-ventilated, poorly heated and badly lighted rooms their children dwell in while at school; furthermore, how unconcerned they appear in reference to their physical comfort while passing through this critical period of development in mind and body. Then should the question of increased expenditure for the purpose of enlarging, improving or erecting new buildings be agitated; what bitter opposition it is certain to meet. True there are those who can ill afford an increase in taxes, but this is not the class from whom we generally receive the greatest opposition; but rather from those who do not appreciate the great advantage of a liberal education: notwithstanding all these difficulties we see commendable progress in country, village, town and city, in the supply of comfortable and substantial school buildings, and the number of "stick in the mud" class growing beautifully less. The better education of the rising generation, from whom our Statesmen, Clergy, Teachers, and leading characters in all departments of life must emenate, justly claims our liberal support and devoted attention.

THEY ARE LEGION.

The crops of candidates for M. P. P. in East Grey appears to be superabundant. The following names have been mentinoed as aspirants, viz—Thos. Kells Dr. Christoe, Joseph Rorke, T. McKenny, Thos. Gilray, J. J. Johnston, A. McGirr, J. B. Hand and the present member N. McColman. There are no doubt others which will crop up before the meeting of the convention on the 11th October. By the way, we may be the nominee ourselves, Mr. Creighton, editor of the Owen Sound Times, is the able representative of North Grey, Mr. Jenkins, editor of the Chronicle, is making a strong bid for that position in South Grey, and why not complete the list and give the editor of the STANDARD the honor of representing East Grey, and if we don't give a good account of our stewardship, call us Uncle Davie. Three editors from Grey! why the world would be convinced that this country was singulary blessed with superior intelligence. In the meantime we entreat our readers and the puplic not to promise their support until after the convention.

College Federation

The vote on Thursday night involves a new departure, not only so far as the Methodists are concerned—it touches also and will matreially influence the higher education of the whole Province. It affects not merely those who go into confederation, but also, and with almost equal power, those who stay out. All will feel its stimulating effect. All will thereby be more than ever put upon their mettle. Those who have gone into the new arrangement will be bound, by every consideration of interest and honor to do their very best to show that the fears expressed were groundless than the expectations cherished could be more than made good.

Then not less will the Local Government and the authorities of the University and University College be bound to show that the confidence reposed in their honor has not been misplaced. These we are certain, have no thought but to be as open as the day. They know that they are not conspirators, as some have most unwarrantably hinted, watching to take advantage of either the weakness or the innocence of those with whom they have been negotiating. They know that all along their motives have been single and transparent. But after all that has been said and done, they must feel themselves more than ever bound to put this beyond question. There has been trust reposed on both sides, and now come the opportunity and the obligation to show that this trust has not been misplaced; that they are not unscrupulous shysters, watching their miserable opportunity to trip up each other's heels; but men of honor, and Christian gentlemen besides, whose word is as good as their bond.

In the mere internal organization then necessary under the new order of things, we believe there will be no difficulty. The Methodist have wealth enough and liberality enough among themselves to do all which in this respect will be required, aye, and even a great deal more. Their zeal also, we are sure, will provoke many. Mr. Mulock, we prophesy, will not be the only outside who will feel privileged in having some stones in the new building and some dollars in the new endowment, not because their help is needed, because they will love to have it so.

And will the friends of University College and the affiliated theological schools be slow to catch the generous enthusiasm, or be willing to show themselves laggards in the race of generous and high hearted liberality? We are quite sure they will not. Once get people thoroughly in earnest over a praiseworthy object, which appeals alike to their judgments and feelings, and it is surprising how the money is forthcoming. So will it be in this case.—[Globe.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Our Township Fathers met in Council in the council chambers here on Monday last, in the absence of the Reeve Dr. Christoe (who in attendance as a delegate at the Methodist General Conference, Toronto) Deputy Reeve, J. McArthur occupied the chair.

From the large droves of cattle that commenced to crowd into the village from north south east and west at an early hour on Monday last one could easily be convinced that it was fair day. There was a good number of buyers on hand and a good number of cattle changed hands at fair prices.

Mr. Whitton, Sen., another of the wealthy farmers of this township wishing to spend the balance of his days in ease and enjoy the comforts of this life purchased a beautiful building site on the elevation in the east ward of our Town, his new dwelling is fairly under way and he expects to move in early this fall.

Mr. J. Reid of Chicago, brother-in-law of the late Chas. Haler, wishing to get away from the crowded city life, has also purchased in our pretty and enterprising village, and intends pushing forward a handsome residence as early as possible.

The Stock of Mr. Abbey, blacksmith of Berkeley, was sold here on Monday last by A. S. VanDusen.

Our esteemed citizen Wm. Elder, Esq., is contemplating moving with his family to a warmer climate, he has California in view.

The old Durham Road has been the scene of a considerable excitement for the past few weeks. A short time ago, Mrs. Mary Watson had her daughter and son-in-law up before Squire Armstrong, J. P., for assault, when a fine was duly imposed, a few days ago Mrs. Watson appeared again to lodge her fourth. complaint against her daughter for similar offence the old lady bore marks upon her person of a severe pummiling.

The Quarterly District Convention of the "Royal Templers of Temperance," and a large representation of the "Sons of Temperance" met in the Town Hall here on Thursday afternoon last. Questions of deep interest in connection with Temperence advancement and prohibition were discussed, and thoroughly ventilated, committees for special work were formed, of the most important is that of the committee for "Law and Order" the motto now is Prohibition for Grey, and through Prohibition candidates for our local Legislative Halls. Staunch Temperance men, no other need apply. In the evening a Concert was given in the Hall under the auspices of the R. T. of T. there was a fair attendance and the Program, was fairly well sustained. Mr. John Gordon occupied the chair, and performed his duties there in a very pleasant manner.

The Educational Sermons in connection with this Station were preached by the Rev. W. Ayers in the Methodist Church here on Sabbath last there were good congregations present, the Sermons were both interesting and instructive.

The Rev. Mr. Ayers purposes D. v. delivering a lecture in the Methodist church here Monday evening next. Subject "Supremacy of the mind."

MR. EDITOR:—I notice my notes for last week mailed here early Tuesday morning did not reach you till Wednesday noon too late for insertion. may hap the post clerk were off to a pic-nic or taking half a holiday. We'll try them again—A large number of our citizens are off to the city this week we presume taking in the Exhibition &c.

CHURCH ORGANIZE.—The New Baptist Church an attractive and neat little building will be formally opened D. V. on Sabbath next. The services are expected to be of an interesting character, the Rev. Mr. Grant of London, will preach morning and evening, and Rev. Mr. Ayers in the afternoon, all those who l. Mr. Grant on a former occasion here, we feel sure will be delighted to have the privilege of again listening to him in his addresses here; on the Monday evening following a platform meeting will be held when the Rev. Mr. Grant, Rev. Mr. Ayers, Rev. Mr. Wilson and others are expected to be present and deliver addresses.

Mr. James Beecroft proposes retiring from farm life and moving into our interesting town this fall, having purchased from Mr. A. R. Fawcett, Esq., the dwelling and grounds purchased by him a short time ago from the late Mr. Munroe. Mr. Beecroft who is doing a nice smart business in his line here intends erecting his green-house on his lot here, and paying strict attention to all his numerous customers.

On Monday evening last the Rev. Mr. Ayers delivered his very popular interesting and instructive lecture on "The Supremacy of the Human mind," in the Methodist church, the evening being very unproptious there was not as large an audience as would otherwise have been, all present were apparently well pleased, after the lecture brief addresses were delivered by Rev. Mr. Watson, Mr. Wm. Irwin our public school principle, A. R. Fawcett, Esq., Editor, and Mr. M. Richardson. Dr. Sproule, M. P. was expected to be present and officiate as chairman, failing to attend his brother R. J. Sproule, Esq., of this village was voted to the chair and filled the position in a very creditable manner.

School matters—The Arbitrators appointed by the county council on the appeal on petition for School Section at the Station, met in the Town Hall here on Saturday, to hear the appelants and Trustees. Mr. Hogg stated the case for petitioners and pleaded most ably and eloquently for the formation of a new School Section, he had got a list of 54 children of school age which he claimed were in the limits of the proposed section, or if not all at present in it, the absentees were belonging to it, and although the territory was small and the assessment small and the probable tax to meet an expense of $350 a year for maintenance of a school he admitted would be some 22 mills on the dollar, yet he said they were willing to pay it. He was supported by Mr. Cook and Mr. McMullen. Mr. M. Richardson spoke first against dividing School Section No. 5. He said they (the Trustees) had never opposed any proposal of any part of their section to detach themselves to form new sections or new allowances until this summer. When called on before by the council to hear petitions for division they (the Trustees) had told the council to do what they thought for the best interests of all, but now circumstances had changed, they had been forced by the representatives from the Station to provide more school accommodation and had made provision to build a new school house to meet the wants of the section as it now stood; he stated also that the proposed new section had not the number of children of school age as required by law to form a new section, that the only reliable authority they had was the assessor's roll which showed less than half the required number, that the list produced by petitioners contained names of people not now living in the section and of tohers temporily there in capacity of servants and of one family just arrived this week (and which it has since transpired were only imported for a few days to make up the number required by law). Mr. Richardson pleaded also as a property-owner in the new section against the enormous tax which would be put on to meet the cost of maintaining even a third rate school. Mr. S. Damude spoke on the inexpediency of dividing the school in the way proposed, of the positive lack of children of school age as by law required and the injustice to his section after deferring our school building for years waiting the adjustment of section boundries, and never opposing any propositions from the Station or else where for readjusting their boundaries; now when we were committed to a scheme of school building, to disturb and divide the section was unwise and impolite. The Arbitrators adjourned for dinner and met again in the afternoon. It took them the whole day to come to a decision, but they finally concluded that if the petitioners were willing to pay for their whistle, although it would be expensive, they should be allowed to have it, and the appeal was granted.

Weather very cold.

Large crowds of citizens are leaving for Toronto to take in the sights at the exhibition, to come home satisfied with what they saw.

School started Monday last after undergoing considerable repairs which were much needed.

The steamer General Wolleasley was burned last Friday off Cape Crooker. The crew and a small excursion party escaped in a small boat none the worse only a good ducking. The fire is supposed to have caught from a lautern in the hold, and burnt to the water's edge.

Steamers Alberta, Atlantic and Pacific was in and left on their regular trips, carrying large passenger and freight lists.

There was considerable misunderstanding at the Police Court last week between Mr. Spencer the magistrate, and Chief of Police Egerton, and Mr. Platt, lawyer, after an exciting argument in a free fight, Mr. Platt finding himself forcibly ejected from the court. Mr. P. is now suing Mr. Spencer and Chief of Police, laying damages at $25,000.

Fruit is being brought into town in large quantities and of a good sample. Think there must be quite a large crop this year.

HEALTH.

Food, its Quantity and Quality.

The connection between life and nutrition is so close and inseparable, that the continuance of the former depends upon the supply of the latter. The variation and form of life, whether animal or vegetable, depends upon the quantity and quality of nutrition with which it is supplied.

We are readily able to judge of the quantity and quantity of nourishment supplied to a vegetable that we are caring for, and will at once decide whether the supply is normal, insufficient or in excess of the nutrition necessary. Every living organism demands its own peculiar supply designed for it by the laws of nature. When the natural supply is normal in all respects, the life is healthy. The same law holds good in the higher order of life that we observe in the lower. Insufficient alimentation in the vegetable kingdom is followed by consequences which we are not liable to misunderstand. There is loss of health and vigor, a gradual shrinking, and if the process is permitted to go on, death occurs. A great excess of even the natural nutrition tends to the same result. A marked departure in either direction from the normal standard of supply will, with very few exceptions, be followed by a marked departure from the normal standard of life.

In man the effect of over-eating or under-eating is not so observable, owing to the more complex nature, still the same rule doubtless holds good. It is needless to mention that brutes suffer from improper feeding and particularly over-feeding. Excessive alimentation in the human being is followed by the same baneful consequences. Is it not a fact that the generality of people eat too much? Very few eat too little. It is a common-place aphorism: "He eats so much that it makes him poor to carry it." As a rule, a large, lean, cadaverous-looking man, is an immederate eater, whilst the majority of our robust and healthy men are moderate consumers of food, or are what we call small eaters. The reason of this is plain. He who eats more than is demanded by nature, imposes a heavy strain on the organs involved in the process of digestion and elimination. The stomach, for instance, is capable of doing a certain amount of work, hence if over-taxed unduly, the result sooner or later will be imperfect digestion, impure blood, disordered functions, and gradual loss of vigor and strength. As certain as we overstep the bounds of nature and overtax our stomach for our palate's sake, we begin to sow the seed of disease. Certainly the stomach is a remarkable organ, and able to resist the assaults of imprudence with wonderful courage, but its power of endurance will not withstand every imposition heaped upon it, and sooner or later it will succumb to the force of the unrelenting overwork.

The physician should be as careful in regard to the treatment of over-fed and under-fed patients, as in the quantity and kind of medicine used in the treatment of a special disease. It is too common an error, when we see patients emaciated, to advise abundance of nourishing food, while probably it is a well-laden table that is at the foundation of the condition sought to be relieved. There is far more danger from over indulgence than under-eating. Although we desire to impress the fact that over-eating is common and should be strictly guarded against, we are not unaware of the existence of under-fed or half-starved people, but this is by no means as common an evil, and very little disease is traceable thereto.

LOTION FOR SUNBURN.—Take of powdered borax and glycerine, each six drams; rose-water or elder-flower water, twelve ounces. Mix. The daily application of this lotion to the face and hands will keep them white and clean by its excellent cleansing properties, will prevent chaps, and remove sunburn.

The British Medical Journal "Infallible" says: "The best remedy for worms is a powder, containing from three to five grains of santonine, according to age, and a fourth of a grain of calomel. Prepare six; the first two powders to be taken at twelve hours interval and the remainder at twenty-four hours interval, followed by a dose of castor oil.

BURNS AND SCALDS.—Cover the injured part with a cloth soaked in oil, and over this place some cotton wool, the object being to exclude the air and keep the part warm. The pain of slight burns or scalds may be eased by dusting them with flour. When severe or extensive, further surgical treatment is required.

The first liquid fish glue ever manufactured on Canadian territory was sent by a recent steamer by Messrs. Chase & Co., of St. John, N. B., to London, England.

Sharks are said to be quite numerous off Tracadie. A fisherman caught one there the other day, in about 17 fathoms of water, which measured over five feet in length.

A bear, weighing upwards of 350 lbs., was killed the other day near South Mountain, N. S. Bears are now somewhat numerous in the vicinities of Yarmouth and Grand Pre.

Two Lunenburg schooners passed through the Strait the other day on their way home from Labrador. They report the Labrador cod fishery a total failure, and were only able to secure one-third of their cargoes.

Col. Gleder, the Arctic explorer, has a personal knowledge of the Hudson's Straits, and he is firmly convinced that they are navigable even by sailing vessels during a considerable portion of the year.

Joseph Manders died at Grey Nunnery, at Montreal, on Friday last, aged 106 years, 4 months, and 17 days. He was born in Portugal, in April, 1780, and, when a soldier in the Peninsular war, was taken prisoner by Napoleon.

Masked men entered the house of Mr. John Wright at the Barter Settlement, N. B., last week, and presenting a revolver at the head of Mr. and Mrs. Wright compelled them to hand over $1,000 in American and English gold, their entire savsavings for years.

On the 1st inst. son of H. Haddock, a farmer near Montreal, was accidentally thrown from a horse that he was hurriedly riding, striking the back part of his head against a jagged rock, making an ugly wound and severely fracturing the skull. The young man's condition is precarious, medical opinion being doubtful about his recovery from the dangerous injuries doubtful.

A Gaspe correspondent writes of the Island of Anticosti:—"The Island is a terrible place for emigrants to settle on, where hardship and hunger are sure to accompany them. Better far for poor emigrants in Europe to beg their bread among their kith and kin than to leave home and friends in search of fortunes on Anticosti, whence the Government will be obliged to remove them ere they die of starvation."

Tens of thousands of blackbirds, flying in one flock in a south-easterly direction from Wardsville, was a sight not often witnessed which happened one day recently. Hundreds of them alighted on a large tree in the English Church parsonage for a few seconds, and then were off again, while others took their places, and they in turn, after a few seconds rest, followed their companions. The noise made by the chirping of the birds and the fluttering of their wings could be heard for a considerable distance. Blackbirds have also been seen in large numbers in other places.

Fishermen tending nets in the vicinity of Cape Sabiz have been much annoyed lately by sharks constantly swimming around their boats and devouring the dead herring which happened to drop out of the meshes. On Friday last they invaded a large extent of the cod fish ground, and some narrow escapes of fishermen are reported. One fisherman had to change his ground to get clear of a shark described as ever twenty feet long and bent on mischief. Another person out in a small skiff had to call a boat to his assistance to prevent his craft being capsized and to aid him in beating off a huge shark which seemed determined to sample him.

A remarkable instance of presence of mind was displayed by a gentleman in Hull the other night, and which, although imperilling himself, in all probability prevented another widespread and disastrous conflagration. It seems that Mr. Wm. McEwan, a grocer, was handling a barrel of high-wines when the spigget fell out and a quantity of the liquid flew out of the hole and, notwithstanding that both hands were severely burned, he kept it there until the flames were extinguished. If the flames had reached the contents an explosion must have ensued, and as the store was merely a frame building, similar to all the surrounding houses, a disastrous fire would in all probability have resulted.

An Exaggerating Family.

"Father, I don't want to saw any wood today; yesterday I sawed about a thousand cords and mother made me walk a hundred miles and carry three or four barrels of water for her. I haven't had a holiday for ten years. Last Jim saw seven or eight hundred cords of wood for a change."

"William, you must cease this exaggerated way of talking. I've spoken to you about it a million times, and if I have to do it again, I'll break your neck."

YOUNG FOLKS.

Told for Ida.

Once upon a time there lived a princess. She was a very pretty little girl, with eyes as blue as the violets that grow by the meadowbrook, and cheeks as pink as wild roses, and hair as golden as sunshine. And all the people loved this little princess because she was so kind and loving and lovable. But she had one great fault, and that was,—Pro-cras-ti-na-tion.

Sometimes this little yellow-haired princess would be playing with her dolls or reading a story-book, when her mamma would say,—

"Ida, dear, run upstairs and fetch me a spool of silk from my table."

And Ida would answer, with a sweet smile,—

"In a minute, mamma."

One minute would go by, and another, and a great many more.

"Will you get my silk, Ida?"

"Oh yes, mamma, as soon as I finish this chapter."

"Now, Ida."

"In just a minute, mamma." But the chapter was sure to be finished, with perhaps another one, before the silk would be fetched.

It was not only once, but all the time.

"What can I do?" sighed the queen, to her trusty counsellor. "I must break her of this dreadful habit some way, or when she comes to rule a kingdom of her own, all will go to wrack and ruin. What can I do?"

"Teach her a lesson, your Majesty," said the trusty counsellor, gruffly. "Teach her a lesson—a good lesson."

And one day the queen remembered her trusty counsellor's words. The little princess came bounding in, to be dressed for a drive, with her blue eyes shining, and her yellow hair tossing about her face, and her cheeks pinker than usual, which is saying a good deal.

"We're going up to the Mountain Castle for lunch, mamma," cried she, "and home around by the lake! And Lillian says her uncle can't wait but a minute, and won't you hurry, mamma, and get me dressed?"

Mamma, the queen, was reading a book, and she hardly raised her eyes from it, but answered, with a smile,—

"In a minute, dear."

So the little princess fidgeted restlessly from one foot to another for what seemed to her a long, long time.

"Won't you, mamma?"

"Oh yes, dear; as soon as I finish what I am reading."

Wasn't it awful? The blue eyes of the little princess began to look like violets after a shower; and the voice of the little princess trembled.

"But they can only wait five minutes, mamma," she pleaded. "Oh, do hurry!"

"Right away," answered mamma, calmly.

But just then the little princess heard carriage-wheels rolling down the avenue, and she burst into a cry of grief and dismay.

"O mamma, they've gone without me! I told them to it I didn't come in five minutes. And they had chocolate cake and jelly tarts for lunch! Oh dear me!" And then a flood of tears came.

Mamma, the queen, couldn't help smiling a little, though she felt very sorry, too. But she hoped this would be the lesson; and she took her little daughter on her knee, and talked to her about that old thief, procrastination, which is, you know, a name for putting-off-till-by-and-by what should be done now.

"You will try and do better, won't you, dear?" said mamma, the queen, very tenderly; and the little princess, when her sobs were stilled, answered that she would try.

"But it's very hard to do things right off," said she, "unless it's things you want to do, mamma."

"Right there selfishness comes in, dear," said mamma, "and selfishness will unlock the door and let in a host of other bad, bad faults."

And then mamma, who could not bear to punish her little girl too much, ordered her own carriage, and away they sped after their friends.

Princess Ida is trying yet to do better; she has set a guard over those red lips of hers with strict orders not to let the troublesome words, "In a minute," slip by. And though she isn't perfect yet, we think she is almost as near that as it is possible for any little girl to be.

Johnny Was Posted on Miracles.

Little Johnny Jerden was a passenger on a suburban train. Beside him sat a tall, solemn-looking man with side whiskers. In front were Johnny's pa and ma, and behind him his aunt Hetty. The whole party had been to church, and the man sitting beside Johnny was the minister going out to spend the afternoon with the Jerdens.

"My little man," said the minister to Johnny, "did you pay close attention to the sermon?"

"Yessir."

"Do you remember that I said something about miracles?"

"Yessir."

"Well, Johnny, do you know what a miracle is?"

"Yessir."

"Tell me, please."

"Well, all I know about it is ma said this morning that it would be a miracle if we could go to church once without havin' the minister taggin' home with us to dinner. So I guess this hain't no mir—"

"Johnny Jerdon! (from the front seat.)

A Lightning Hair-Cut.

A young woman in a country town in France was hurrying home during a thunder storm, shielding herself with an umbrella, when she suddenly experienced a strange and alarming sensation, the shock being simultaneous with a very vivid flash of lightning. She felt "quite upset," but proceeded on her way. On reaching home she removed her bonnet, when she discovered that her hair had been literally cut off, her head presenting, as the hair fell, the same appearance as though it had been shaved with a razor. Her narrow escape produced such an effect upon the girl's mind that she has been confined to her bed ever since.

MADDENED BY NIAGARA.

The Turmoil of the Rapids Turns a Man's Brain.

"I have not the least doubt," said an eminent physician at a recent medical convention, "that at least one out of every ten of the people in this country live under some form of insanity. In some it becomes violent; in others noticeable; in others never known nor suspected, except there is what might be termed a collusion of circumstances."

There have been some curious cases of this last species of insanity. Some seven or eight years ago a well-known public official of the State of Ohio visited Niagara Falls with his family for a month's rest. He was nervous and worn out, and there were certain business and political matters which followed him there and

COULD NOT BE SHAKEN OFF.

The gentleman did not realize that his nerves were at all shaken; on the contrary, he prided himself in believing that he could endure more mental worry than three ordinary men. He had been at the Falls three or four days when he was joined by a Chicago capitalist. The two had a speculation together, and the details were to be settled here.

One day after dinner the pair went into Prospect Park and sat down on a bench facing the rapids, and not over five feet from the water. When they had talked for an hour or so, the Ohio gentleman seemed to be somewhat excited in his speech and movements. He threw several sticks into the water, talked in loud tones, and soon attracted attention. The capitalist but felt no uneasiness until the other suddenly seized him in a tremendous grip and said:

"Blank, you are a d——d scoundrel, and I'm going to send you over the falls!"

The capitalist was the smaller and the weaker man, and he felt the hopelessness of the situation. He was gripped by the shoulders, but he used his hands to clench the seat behind him, and replied to the lunatic

"I know I'm a bad man, and you must give me time to pray."

"All right, all right," said the Ohioan: "you shall have two minutes for prayers, and then we'll go over the falls together. Say, Blank, you are a d——d good fellow, after all, and we'll go together."

The idea with the Chicago man was, of course, to gain time. The people who had been attracted by the loud talk had passed on, and it so happened that no one else came that way. He hoped the lunatic would change his mind after two or three minutes, but instead of that he grew more impatient, declaring that they must hurry up or they would be too late. Despairing of aid from others, the capitalist finally said:

"See here, Mr. Blank, let's go up and jump off the Goat Island bridge. We'll have further to swim, and I want to leave my wallet with some one."

"By George! Good idea; come on!" exclaimed the other, and they walked up the path and out of the park arm in arm. They were no sooner out of sight of the rapids than the Ohioan began to grow calmer, and as they bore off toward the hotels scratched his head in a thoughtful way, and picked up the point he dropped a quarter of an hour before and went on debating the transaction as if nothing had occurred. An hour later, when asked if he was in earnest in threatening his friend, he was completely dumbfounded, nor could he be made to believe that anything of the sort had occurred. However, a dim suspicion that he might have been unduly excited by the roar and clash of the waters crept into his mind. He went down to the park alone, but returned almost at once, his face very pale, his eyes betraying wildness, and his whole manner showing that he had passed through a severe struggle.

"I shall keep away from the water hereafter," he said to the capitalist. "I couldn't stay there five minutes without committing suicide or murder."

The matter was of course kept quiet, even from his wife, but two years later, while the gentleman was making a trip on the Ohio River he was suddenly missed, and he has never been heard of since. The boat was racing with another, and the probabilities are that the excitement brought back his passion for self-destruction, and that he went overboard.

SCIENTIFIC AND USEFUL.

It cannot be too widely known that meat is sometimes made unwholesome by the use of certain kinds of wooden skewers.

Experiments by M. Bouchut have proved that the tape-worm succumbs to the digestive action of pepsine in large doses, while the more highly-organized tissues of the stomach are unaffected.

To make a good black japan for small castings take of asphaltum half a pound; melt and add hot balsam of capivi one pound; mix well and thin with oil of turpentine. Give three coats, and dry in an oven at between 250° and 300° Fahr.

A very useful kind of varnish is described by M. Leon Vidal, which is excellent for producing imitation ground glass, and will doubtless be found available for other purposes. The formula is—Sandarac, eighteen parts; mastic, four; ether, two hundred; benzol, eighty to one hundred parts.

To make a waterproof paste to stick silk on silk, macerate virgin rubber—caoutchouc—cut into finest shavings with about ten times its weight of pure benzole in an open mouthed bottle set in hot water—away from fire—shake occasionally, and add more benzole, if necessary, until a perfect solution is obtained. The cement should not be used in such quantity as to delay drying.

By coating over the surface of glass mirrors with glycerine, their clouding by the accumulation of condensed water vapour will be prevented for a considerable time. The attraction of the glycerine is so great for the water as to absorb the latter as fast as deposited. This hint may prove of great use to dentists, who are frequently troubled by the clouding of mouth-mirrors, and it may also be of value to those who are compelled to shave themselves in chilly apartments.

A BRIDEGROOM JUMPS FROM [illegible] TRAIN.

While on his Wedding Tour he Becomes Crazy and Leaps to his Death.

An exciting scene was witnessed on a midnight express train while running at high rate of speed on the Lebanon Valley Railroad, ten miles from Reading the other night. The passengers were suddenly startled by a scuffle in the middle of the car. A well-dressed young man named Levi Brobst arose abruptly, and in a loud voice exclaimed:

"I'm tired of riding."

His beautiful young wife beside him urged him by the coat and said: "Sit down; we'll soon be at Reading.

"Not a bit of it, Gussie," he replied. "I'm going no further; see the lights burning out yonder."

He then made a hasty move toward the door of the car, when his wife seized him by his coat and implored him to sit down. The other passengers in the car at first thought it might simply be a personal misunderstanding, and they made no effort to interfere. Another lady of the party, a middle-aged woman, named Mrs. J. C. High, left her seat and ran to the wife's assistance. Brobst seized the excited young man and told him to be seated. By a powerful effort he broke away from the grasp of his wife, but Mrs. High kept hold of his coat.

Brobst now became furious, and [illegible] dragged Mrs. High to the door. The latter shouted for assistance, but before any one had the courage to interfere Brobst tore off his coat, and thus got away from the ladies' grasp. He leaped for the door, crying out at the top of his voice:

"Good by. Here she goes."

The next second he jumped to the platform, and in the next instant leaped off into the darkness, while the train was speeding on at thirty-five miles per hour.

The young wife fainted in her seat, while her husband was being hurled [illegible] down a twenty-feet rocky embankment. The train was speedily stopped, and the victim was found dying among the boulders. His face and body were horribly cut. He was brought to Reading, where he died in St. Joseph's Hospital this morning. His wallet contained $300, was lost when he jumped, and was not found.

He was 30 years of age, and a handsome, well-built young man. He was married to Miss Gussie Leffler on the Wednesday previous in West Point, Neb., and they were on their wedding trip to Slatington, north of Reading. His body was taken there where his parents live. The bride says she first noticed a change in her husband in Chicago. He had not been well, and had not eaten anything for three days. The excitement of his wedding made him very nervous. His mind gradually became unbalanced. He raved and spoke incoherently, and at last jumped off the train.

Boys and Their Mothers.

Of all the love affairs in the world, none can surpass the true love of the big boy for his mother. It is pure love and noble, honorable in the highest degree to both. I do not mean a dutiful affection. I mean a love which makes a boy gallant and courteous to his mother, saying to everybody plainly that he is fairly in love with her. Next to the love of a husband, nothing so crowns a woman's life with honor as this second love, this devotion of a son to her. And I never yet knew a boy "turn out" bad who began by falling in love with his mother. Any man may fall in love with a fresh-faced girl, and the man who is gallant with the girl may cruelly neglect the worn and weary wife. But the boy who is a lover of his mother in her middle age, is a true knight, who will love his wife as much in the autumn leaved autumn as he did in the dainted spring-time.

Lottie and Sophy had their quarrel, in the midst of which Chris and Peter arrived, and we went to dinner.

Chris folded his arms and put on a dogged and determined look as he took his place at table.

"I breakfasted off cold fowl," he said gloomily—"I lunched off cold fowl—I refuse to dine off it."

My aunt grew tearful again.

"This is not cold fowl," she answered; "it is turkey, and you might eat it. Cold beef will keep a day or two—fowls and turkeys, with sauce over them, will not. But"—turning to me resignedly—"ring for the beef to be brought in Meg; we have had enough unpleasantness for one day."

"How is it there is a whole turkey left?" inquired Chris, somewhat mollified as the beef appeared.

"It was Meg's fault," replied aunt Charlotte. "She put it on that dark shelf behind the cellar door, and I found it there this morning quite forgotten. But I wonder Meg, you did not notice that there were only two turkeys at supper; this would have been eaten if it had been there."

"I did not have any supper," I said, "for I thought there would not be room."

"That is merely an excuse," interposed Lottie; "you were spooning with John Howarth in the conservatory all supper-time."

I meant to look defiant, but I may have looked guilty.

"Did he propose to you?" asked Sophy staring at me.

"I will put a stop to this nonsense about John Howarth?" I said determinedly. "You shall all know exactly how the case stands and then there will be no further display for stale wit at our expense. As Sophy supposes Mr. Howarth did propose to me last night."

"Oh, Chris," interrupted Lottie, "how could you hit my cat in such a savage way? Come here Tip—poor pussy!"

"You should teach your cat not to stick his claws into one's legs at dinner time," retorted Chris; "then he wouldn't get hit."

"He was not touching you!" returned Lottie warmly. He was begging quite inoffensively."

"He was sticking his claws into my leg," reiterated Chris, with quiet and most aggravating obstinacy.

"Now don't you two begin quarrelling," said Sophy impatiently, "But let Meg tell us about Mr. Howarth. I have often read about proposals in tales, but I have never heard a real bona fide one described. Do tell us every word he said, Meg!"

"Did he go down upon his knees? asked Chris. "For, if he did, I wish I had been there to see him."

"I shall not tell you whether he went down upon his knees or not," I answered calmly; "nor shall I tell you what he said. But," I added with sentimental meditation, "he said some very nice things indeed to me—me—nicer than you could put together Chris if you tried for a hundred years."

"I can assure you I am not going to try, even for a minute," answered Chris giving me a most savage look.

My aunt suddenly burst into tears.

"This is the finishing blow," she sobbed—"Meg going to be married! I will never give another party as long as I live! It was again my better judgment that I yielded this time. I did it to please you all, and this is the result—furniture ruined, eatables wasted, your father ill, you all quarrelling like this, and Meg going to be married! No, never another party in this house!"

"What—not even when Meg marries John Howarth?" sneered Chris.

"No, not even then," replied aunt redoubling her sobs.

"Well, don't cry, auntie," I interposed, "for I am not going to marry him. I gave him a very decided 'No.'

Chris here gives a quick covert glance in my direction; after which his assumption of perfect indifference seemed to me a trifle overacted.

"Oh," laughed Lottie, "that explains why the poor fellow ate trifle instead of fowl with his boiled ham, and never found out the difference. I thought what a curious taste he had."

But aunt refused to be pacified; she had reached that state of mind when troubles are positively preferred to blessings.

"Saying 'No' to Mr Howarth will not buy a new drawing room carpet," she said, "or eat up all the tarts and custards and cakes. I am sure"—warming to her subject—"the waste has been shameful! When the confectioner's man came this morning, I had not a single cake or jelly or blancmange to send back, for every one had been broken into! And I saw you, Chris, take just a spoonful out of that expensive porcupine, when a plainer cake already commenced was close by you."

"Oh, don't blame Chris for that auntie!" I exclaimed. "It was done for Miss Jones, If he had the power, Chris would cut a bit off the Koh-i-noor itself if she asked him."

"I would," said Chris; "she is worth a hundred Koh-i-noors."

"Really!" observed Peter, aroused at last from the gloomy lethargy that had possessed him all dinner-time, and addressing Chris. "What a pity she does not regard you in the same light! She told me last night how she hated dancing with you, saying that you were so clumsy you were constantly getting your feet on her dress."

"Indeed!" retorted Chris. "She told me the same thing about you."

"I don't believe it," said Peter,

"Do you mean to say I am telling lies?" demanded Chris.

"Another quarrel! cried my aunt. "Oh dear, dear, what will be the end of it all?"

"The end of it all might be pleasant enough," I replied with energy, "if only every one of you would display a little common-sense. I am out of patience with you all!"

"Well, Meg," said Lottie calmly, "you generally seem to consider yourself capable of setting the world to rights; so can you set our little world straight? It seems to me we are all miserable. What can you suggest to make us all happy?"

"Common sense," I repeated—"only common-sense. Take my advice and peace will be restored at once."

"Let us have it then," said my aunt querulously.

"Oh, let us have 'Meg's advice' at once!" sneered Chris again. "How is it we have not thought of this panacea earlier?"

"I will commence with my uncle," I began firmly. "Let him—at least, make him—see the doctor to-night, and he will be better before morning."

"That is good advice enough," said aunt, "and I will tell him."

"As for you aunt—go to bed at once and forget your worries. We will start a subscription-list for you, which I will head with five shillings; and, if the others give with equal liberality according to their means, you will be able to replace all the broken crockery and have the white hearth-rug cleaned also.

"That is good advice too, and I will do my part by going to bed immediately," said aunt meekly. "I am much obliged to you, Meg."

"As for you, Peter," I continued severely, "I think, instead of quarrelling with Chris about Miss Jones, you had better turn your attention nearer home. I know poor little Kitty Reynolds would nearly cry her eyes out when she got home last night, or rather this morning."

"You know more than I do then," returned Peter.

"Yes, I do; for I am in Kitty's confidence, and you are not; and I know what Kitty said to me when she was going home, and you do not. And my advice to you, Peter, is make it up with Kitty, and leave Miss Jones for those who want her."

"Capital advice! But I never asked you for it, you see; so I don't consider myself bound to take it;" and he went on eating tarts.

"And now, girls," I continued looking at Lottie and Sophy, "make up your minds to the inevitable, and change lovers. They are twins, and so much alike you cannot always tell which is which; and I think it must be merely contrariness in you two to pretend you like either one better than the other; and"—with just a careless glance at Chris—"contrariness never pays in the end. So take my advice—transfer your affections quietly, and say no more about it."

Then I helped myself to some blancmange, and went on eating my dinner.

"But you have forgotten me," observed Chris; "pray have you no advice for me?"

I hesitated a moment, then looked at him defiantly.

"Well," I said, "I think the advice I have given Peter might also apply to you; instead of making yourself ridiculous about Miss Jones, I think you might find some one to admire nearer home."

Then, owing to Peter's delighted "Brave Meg!" and Chris's steady stare I had a sensation that I had never experienced in all my self-possessed life before—I think it was embarrassment—and I rose hastily from the table and left the room, presumably to see "why that dog howled so." And Chris must have felt curious on the point too, for he also left the table and followed me to Nero's kennel.

When we came in again, Peter was standing in the hall with his top coat on, brushing his hat very carefully.

"Why, Peter," I exclaimed, "where are you going? I should have thought you would have been more inclined for bed than a walk. Where are you going?"

Peter looked at us with a curious mixture of defiance and sheepishness in his expression.

"I am going to see Frank Reynolds," he said. "He told me last night that he has a little terrier he thinks I shall like, and he said he would let me have it cheap; so I am going to look at it."

"But," remarked Chris pitilessly, "you know that Frank has gone away from home to-day, and won't be back until Monday; and your journey will be utterly fruitless, will it not, if you find only Kitty in?"

"I shall see the terrier," muttered Peter, putting on his hat, "and shall leave word whether I will have him or not."

"Oh, I have no doubt it will be all right!" I remarked, with an innocent air.

Peter looked at me, and then said—

"What was the matter with Nero?"

"Oh—his chain—I think—his collar!" I stammered, taken aback by the suddenness of his question, and ending by an appealing glance at Chris.

"Never mind, never mind!" cried Peter, waving his hands. "As you said, Meg, I have no doubt it will be all right; it's leap-year, you know, and Chris has only acted as any other man——' Here Peter darted through the hall door, and slammed it after him, otherwise the hat-brush would have struck him.

When Chris and I entered the dining-room, aunt was there.

"Your uncle has just seen the doctor," she said, smiling a little as she kissed me before saying good night; "and, if any of the others have been as ready to act upon your advice, you can let us know in the morning I think we are all ready for bed to-night."

"I shall have to sit up for Peter," said Chris.

"One of the servants can do that," said aunt.

"No, they are all tired out," answered Chris; "and I shall like to sit up, just to see poor Peter's bewilderment when I ask him what is the colour of the terrier."

"Oh, he won't be bewildered at all!" I put in. "He'll answer in all simplicity, 'Plum-colored' or 'Navy-blue,' and then wonder why you look surprised."

When aunt had retired, I noticed that Lottie and Sophy were busy doing something to their photograph-albums, and, observing them quietly, I saw them exchange two photographs, I said nothing; but, when we all went up-stairs together, they were merrier than usual, and quite friendly again.

Thus the day begun so dismally ended right happily; and its results were happier still—for Peter and Kitty are married and happy now; Lottie and Sophy are whispering together about a forthcoming "double-wedding; and Chris—having also condescended to take "Meg's advice" for once—has a wife who worships the very ground he treads on—and he deserves it too.

"Have You Thought About It?

Pain is one of the sure things of life, and it becomes then a most important question to have at hand the quickest and most efficient remedy. Polson's Nerviline cannot fail to cure cramps, toothache, neuralgia, headache and all pain, internal or external. Nerviline is the most perfect combination ever offered to the public for the relief of pain. It will not cost you much to try it, for you can buy it at any drug store for 10 cents a trial bottle, which will convince you of its mighty pain relieving power.

"Fire-proof Paper May be Made,"

says a scientific exchange. "from a pulp, consisting of one part vegetable fibre, two parts asbestos, one-tenth part borax, and one-fifth part alum." It is a pity that such facts as the one following cannot be written, printed or otherwise preserved, upon some sort of indestructible paper. "My wife suffered seven years and was bed ridden, too," said W. E. Huestis, of Emporia, Kansas, "a number of physicians failed to help her. Dr. Pierce's 'Golden Medical Discovery' cured her." All druggists sell this remedy. Everybody ought to keep it. It only needs a trial.

Velvet bodices will be worn this autumn with skirts of different material.

What a Change!

A few short weeks ago that young girl was the personification of health, vigor and beauty. The blush upon her cheeks rivalled that of the rose; her step was light and buoyant, her every movement was a revelation of perfect physical health. Yet now she is pallid and haggard, and her superabundant vitality has given place to a strange dullness and lassitude. What has caused this change? Functional irregularities, which can be cured by Dr. Pierce's "Favorite Prescription," a remedy to which thousands of women to-day owe their lives. All druggists.

Satin in combination with lace is to be a favorite for the coming season.

The great reputation of Brigge' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near like it as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves. Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Eclectric Oil," "Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Sprains and Bruises, complaints arising from Colds such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

Silk gloves are elaborately embroidered the entire length of the arm.

Don't use any more nauseous purgatives such as Pills, Salts, &c., when you can get in Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters, a medicine that moves the Bowels gently, cleansing all impurities from the system and rendering the Blood pure and cool. Great Spring Medicine 50 cts.

Montreal, Sept. 18.—A scheme is on foot having for its object to bring back to Canada the Canadians now in the States. Wealthy Canadian families located in Lowell and Lawrence, Mass., having decided to found a colony in the valley of the Ottawa, two delegates were chosen to arrange preliminaries and to interview the Montreal Colonization Society. The choice of the delegates fell upon La Liever and La Rough valleys, where they expect to take up from 25,000 to 50,000 acres of land.

HOUSEHOLD.

Choice Recipes.

SOUR MILK PIE.—One-half cup of sour milk, one-half cup of raisins after they are seeded and chopped fine, one-half cup of sugar, a little salt and different spices as one pleases. Use only the thick part of the milk. Bake in two crusts.

SURE CURE FOR A FELON.—Common rock salt, dried in an oven and then pulverized, mix with an equal part of spirits of turpentine. Keep a rag constantly wet with this preparation on the felon for twenty-four hours. It will cure a felon in that time.

FISH GEMS.—Take any remnant of boiled fish, chop it fine, and add the same amount of bread crumbs soaked soft in milk, also two eggs beaten and a spoonful of butter; season with salt, pepper, and chopped parsley. Bake in a buttered pan twenty minutes.

GREEN CORN CAKES.—Mix a pint of grated green corn with a teacupful of flour, half a teacupful of milk, and a teacupful of melted butter, one egg, a teaspoonful of salt, and a little pepper. Drop on a buttered pan by the spoonful and bake or fry for ten or fifteen minutes.

CALIFORNIA CHICKEN.—Take two young chickens, cut up and stew; when done add a little minced parsley and onions. Take four large pepper pods, soak in water, strain, and pour in the juice; add salt, butter, and a little flour to thicken. Fill a large dish with boiled rice, and pour the gravy on it.

CHILDREN'S FRUIT CAKE (very nice).—One cup of butter, four cups of flour, one pound sugar, one cup milk, three eggs, three quarters pound currants, three-quarters pound raisins, one quarter pound citron, one quarter grated nutmeg, one-quarter teaspoonful baking powder; flavor with lemon.

TOMATO CATCHUP.—Cut up and stew ripe tomatoes, but do not peel them. When sufficiently cooked strain through a sieve. To one gallon of the tomatoes, measured after straining, add four tablespoonfuls of ground black and white pepper, three tablespoonfuls of ground mustard, three red peppers chopped fine, and one pint of vinegar. Simmer all together slowly for four hours, then bottle and cork tight.

Select only perfect tomatoes for canning. If they are over ripe or have a bad spot in them they will not keep. Tomatoes are excellent sliced, dipped in flour with a little pepper and salt and fried in butter. Another good way is to put a layer of bread crumbs with little lumps of butter, some pepper and salt into a baking dish, then a layer of sliced tomatoes (with skins removed) and another layer of bread crumbs, etc., finishing with the tomatoes on top. Bake about three-quarters of an hour.

BATTER AND FRUIT PUDDING.—Chop up one pound of apples and put them in a greased pudding basin (gooseberries, plums, or any other fruit will do) and sprinkle sugar over them; now make a batter of one egg, six ounces of flour, and one breakfast-cupful of milk; one-half a teaspoonful of baking powder must be added to the flour; when the batter is smooth press it over the fruit and steam gently for one hour; care must be taken that the water remains boiling and does not evaporate too much.

CORN OYSTERS.—One cupful of flour, half a cupful of melted butter, three tablespoonfuls of milk, two teaspoonfuls of salt, one-fourth of a teaspoonful of pepper, one pint of grated corn. Pour the corn on the flour and beat well; then add the other ingredients and beat rapidly for three minutes. Have fat in the frying-pan to the depth of about two inches. When smoking hot put in the batter by the spoonful. Hold the spoon close to the fat and the shape of the oyster will be good. Fry five minutes.

PICKLED PEACHES.—After the peaches are peeled, allow one half pound of sugar to each pound of fruit. With as little water as possible make a syrup of the sugar; when the syrup is quite clear, just scald the peaches in it, and then place them carefully into medium-sized glazed stone jars; sprinkle plenty of stick cinnamon and a few cloves between the fruit. Let the syrup boil for five minutes longer, then add pure vinegar, sufficient to give a pleasant sub acid taste; let it boil up again, and at once pour over the peaches. When cold, tie up well, and store in a dark, cold place.

PRESERVED PEACHES.—For choice preserves it requires choice fruit and the peaches should be all white or all yellow and of even size. Scald them lightly and peel and allow three-quarters of a pound of sugar to each pound of fruit. With as little water as possible make a syrup of the sugar; take off the scum and when it is clear as water put the fruit into it; cover tightly and let it boil from five to ten minutes according to the ripeness of the fruit. With a silver fork lift the peaches into the preserve jars—those with porcelain lined or glass tops are the best—fill up the jars with the syrup to overflowing, wipe the rim carefully and at once close the jars air-tight.

Notes for Housekeepers.

Salt sprinkled around the edge of a room is said to be a safe exterminator of the carpet bug. Some mix pepper with the salt.

To cleanse milk bottles cut a raw potato into long, thin slices and put a few in the bottle with a very little water. Shake thoroughly a minute or two and the milk will be found all adhering to the potato slices.

To prevent the smoking of lamp wicks soak them a while in vinegar and let them dry before returning to the lamp. If burners are clogged and gummy boil them for a half hour in water with a little saleratus and soap.

Crocks of butter to be kept for several months, says the United States Dairyman, should never be placed upon the cellar bottom. This causes two degrees of temperature in the crock which will be at the expense of the quality of the butter near the top. The crocks will keep their contents far better if placed at least a foot from the cellar bottom upon a bench and a thick woolen cloth thrown over it.

Restaurant Matron—"I want you girls to fix up a little extra and look as pretty as you can." Waiter girls—"Is the butter bad again?" "No, the meat's tough."

THE FARM

About Threshing.

A western correspondent writes thus about threshing:—

Few of us in the "wild and wooly west" have room now for our grain. Some of the more progressive have barracks; but to the great majority but two alternatives present themselves—to stack in the open air or to thresh from the sheck. In the days of cradles, or even of self-rake machines, stacking grain was not considered such a great undertaking; but it must be confessed that among the present generation there are few who care to be good stackers, and, if possible, fewer who can. This makes it very difficult to stack grain, and expensive, at the best, stackers getting at least twice as much per day as other harvest hands. But it is not this alone which inclines many to threshing from the sheck. Labor is saved. Not only is the labor of the stackers avoided, but all the labor of pitching the bundles from the wagon to the stack. Even more; for one man, pitching from the wagon, can keep the threshing machine supplied, while it requires two, or possibly three, pitching from the rick. Labor saved is so much money gained at any time; but at this particular season it is an unusual amount gained. Time is precious. Harvest has just ended. All hands are "worked down." Yet the early potatoes must be harvested; the weeds cleaned out of the corn, truck patches, and fence corners once more; the ground for fall wheat plowed—clearly the earlier the better; the manure for this ground drawn from the yards and stables, and yet other work to be done, and seemingly bunched into a period not half long enough for its accomplishment. A saving of a few days' labor at this time is important.

But the arguments are not all in favor of threshing from the shock, as I have found by sad experience. With our steam threshers grain can be threshed very rapidly; but it requires a large force of men to handle it. You must have help from your neighbors, and in return you must help them at stacking or threshing. The result is that you do not get at your plowing or manure hauling any earlier than, if as early, as if you had stacked the grain. It is true that the threshing is done, but at this time the object is to get at work in its season rather than to do work before it is necessary to do it. Threshing can be done later, when the wheat is sown and the potatoes are harvested; and while the days are shorter then, they are enough cooler to compensate for this in amount of work done. Yet another thing: All cannot be the first to thresh; some must wait, and while they are waiting their grain may be sadly damaged in the shock. Such damage is exceedingly probable. We have frequently severe windstorms, accompanied by drenching rain, that will scatter any shock that can be built and then wet the bundles through. I know that the first year I tried threshing from the shock I was one of the last to get to thresh, on account of a misunderstanding I failed to engage a machine until two weeks after I had intended to do so. Wet weather set in and continued. This greatly delayed our threshing. The result was that my grain stood in the shock for six weeks. Many shocks were blown down two or three times. I expected my grain would be ruined. I was agreeably surprised to find that very little was damaged when I finally got it threshed, but setting up the shocks had required more labor than stacking the grain would have done, while the risk I had run and which came so nearly resulting in serious loss has made me disposed to stack my grain, unless it came my turn to thresh early in the season.

It may be argued that grain spoils in the stack, and I must confess that I have had more grain damaged in the stack than in the shock. Twice when I have hired the best stackers to be had, paying them $5 per day, they built such defective stacks that in two of them the grain was damaged to the very bottom, the rain having traversed the stack from top to foundation. But while it is true that I have had more grain damaged in the stack than in the shock, this is because, perhaps, that stacking has been my rule rather and threshing from the shock the exceptions, though they have not been few.

Small grains pass through a sweat, and undoubtedly it is better that this should occur in the stack than in the bin. If it occurs in a stack properly built the grain comes out plump and bright and dry, and will not spoil in the bin by reason of anything existing in the grain itself. But if the sweating takes place in the bin, as it must when the grain is threshed from the shock, shoveling the grain about is often necessary to prevent its molding, and though this be not necessary, the grain is not so bright as if it had cured out among the chaff and straw. Millers much prefer grain that has sweated in the stack, and some, at least, will pay for it 1 or 2 cents more than for grain that has sweated in the bin.

It is apparent that the arguments for and against threshing from the shock are about equally divided. My experience and observation lead me to stack, unless I can be among the very first to thresh. In my neighborhood nearly every one threshes from the shock. In a neighborhood where the majority stacked their grain, the man who threshed from the field could get his grain out of shock in good season, provided he could get sufficient help from his neighbors; but if they stack their grain they will not want to help him thresh until they have finished stacking. Stacking has been the general rule, and it is well that such is the case; threshing direct from the field should be the exception, though if you rightly manage matters you can nearly every year get to thresh as soon as the grain has cured sufficiently, and thus save considerable labor without incurring unusual risk of the grain spoiling in the shock.

To Cure a Corn.

There is no lack of so-called cures for the common ailment known as corns. The vegetable, animal, and mineral kingdoms have been ransacked for cures. It is a simple matter to remove corns without pain, for if you will go to any druggist or medicine dealer and buy a bottle of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor and apply it as directed the thing is done. Get "Putnam's," and no other.

Boston Girl: "Let me see, they have bears and such animals up in the Arctic regions, don't they, Mr. Higgins?" Returned Arctic Explorer: "Oh, yes. I went out one day and followed an immense bear, and finally shot and cached it." Boston Girl: "Catched it?" I suppose you mean caught, don't you, Mr. Higgins?"

A respectable-looking matron one day entered one of the omnibuses that ran regular between Edinburgh and Leith. The omnibus was completely filled, so that on going in she could not find a seat. Looking about her, one of the passengers said: "Ye has nae thing to sit doon on, honest woman." "Oh, aye, I hae something to sit doon on," was her reply, "but I dinna see faur to put it."

The great reputation of Briggs' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near like it as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves.

Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Eclectric Oil," "Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Sprains and Bruises, complaints arising from Colds such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

THE BRAVE AND BRUTAL COWBOY.

An Incident of Prairie Etiquette—Heroic Surgery and Endurance.

But the cowboy, while possessing to a great extent many of the characteristics of both sailor and guide, is even beyond them conspicuous for his sensitive pride, his almost aggressive spirit of independence, his bright intelligence and his sportsmanlike instincts, says a writer. Such at least are the best of them. The cringing servility born of centuries of strongly marked class distinction, the low cunning of the gutter-bred scum of cities, the heavy, beerish stupidity of the peasantry of our older civilizations, are unknown among the free-born citizens of the western states of America. On the other hand, our cowboy is shockingly cruel, hasty in temper, and unbridled in tongue. In the branding-pen, and with a half-broken, tired, or unwilling horse, he is a perfect fiend; his contempt for life too often leads to needless bloodshed; and he is untiring as an Indian in pursuit of revenge.

With him it is frequently not a word and a blow but a word and a bullet. The

ETIQUETTE OF PRAIRIE LIFE,

which, heaven knows, is in most respects not very exacting, absolutely forbids the employment of a certain form of imprecation, which, while calling down Divine punishment on the person addressed, casts an unwarrantable imputation on the character of his immediate female ancestor. The use of such an expression is immediately followed by the production of six-shooters ('cutters," as they are often called), and the death of one or the other of the parties to the disputes. One such incident occurred during the general round-up. Two of our number, one of whom, a man of morose and surly disposition, had lately joined us from a strange outfit, disputed about some thoroughly trivial matter. The quarrel waxed warm and at last the forbidden expression was used against the stranger. Both men were on horseback, but unarmed, but immediately dashed toward the wagons in which they had left their respective weapons. The insulted man, as he passed, snatched out of its open scabbard the six-shooter of a looker-on, turned his horse, and rushed after the enemy. He came upon him as he was on the point of securing his "cutter," and without another word

SHOT HIM DEAD.

That afternoon he fled, and we buried the dead man where he fell. There were few to pity him. He had entered into the quarrel with his eyes open, had himself provoked the risk, and had paid the terrible penalty of his rashness. It was not for us to try his slayer. Vengeance might overtake him sooner or later if the dead man's friends or relations could lay their hands on him, but it would be difficult to find the murderer.

I had provided myself with a self-cocking six-shooter, similar to our own army revolver. This is a most dangerous weapon, and is rarely used by western men, whose experience in the use of the revolver is unequaled. The double action throws the weapon off its mark, and during moments of excitement one is apt to let it off unwittingly. This actually occurred to me more than once, and I resolved to get rid of the "pesky thing." I "traded" it with one of the boys for a very old single-action Colt pattern weapon, and threw a couple of hundred cartridges into the bargain. One morning we close to the wagon, and, knowing that the boys were hunting turkey, we already looked forward to a good breakfast. Presently my friend with the self-cocker rode up turkeyless. After quietly unsaddling his pony he proceeded to whittle a twig. This done he bared his leg, and we then for the first time became aware that he was badly wounded in the thigh. A bullet had gone clean through the fleshy part and had made a wound at least four inches in depth, the upper part of which was very much powder-burnt. He now produced his twig, and, having wrapped a piece of rag round it, coolly ran it to and fro to clean out the powder. He must have endured tortures, for his face paled and beads of perspiration stood on his forehead, but the brave boy never winced, and we gathered from a long string of oaths directed at the pistol and at his pony that he was following a turkey, self-cocker in hand and finger on trigger, when his horse stumbled; he instinctively (as the rider does on such occasions) and tightened his hands, with the above result. That day he rode thirty miles to the nearest military station for a surgeon, with the wounded leg thrown across the horn of the saddle.

HEARD A PISTOL REPORT,

On another occasion we were whiling away the time hunting squirrels, for which purpose one of the boys had taken his boots off and climbed a tree. The rest of us remained below, and were taking pot-shots at the squirrel as it leaped from bough to bough. The climber chased the little creature to the end of a thick bough, himself crawling along it, when, by some misadventure, he was struck in the big toe by a bullet; but we none of us knew this until, after coming down, he quietly mentioned that he "reckoned he'd left a bit of his toe up that ar tree." It was only a small bit of the end, it is true; but I thought that if the same accident had happened to myself I should have given tongue pretty freely. But these fellows are inured to hardship and suffering, and take it as it comes, without a word of complaint.

A Trustworthy Animal.

Liveryman (to customer)—"There, sir, is as good a hoss as ever pulled a waggin. An' you needn't be afraid of him; he's puffeckly safe an' reliable.

Customer (eyeing the animal dubiously)—"I don't know 'bout that. I'd hate to trust him with any oats."

A Safe Conclusion.

"Bah Jove, Charley," said a young man at a ball, "Miss S——asked me if I wouldn't be kind enough to bring her some coffee, and, don't ye know, we've never been introduced. What do you think of that, eh?"

"What do I think of it?" replied Charley. "Why, I think she mistook you for one of the waiters."

PARALYZED BY EMOTION.

A Man's Entire Right Side Made Useless by His Seeing an Exciting Scene.

Thomas L Lavine, roller at the Solar Iron Works, Pittsburg, is lying at his home, with his entire right side and limbs paralyzed. He was well and strong up to Saturday night last, when he went to see the play at Harris' Museum. After one of the emotional scenes, by which he was strongly affected, Mr. Lavine experienced a peculiar sensation in his head and a numb feeling in his right leg and arm,

AS IF THEY WERE "SLEEPING"

He had been sitting with his legs crossed and locked in the rungs of the chair, watching the stage intently, and when the dizziness affected his head he attempted to get up and go out. But when he was in the act of setting his right foot down it dropped helplessly to the floor, as if it had been a wooden limb. He then made a motion to strike or pinch the leg, thinking it was only temporarily benumbed by the position in which he had been sitting. But to his surprise he found that his right arm was also paralyzed and hung helplessly at his side. He became alarmed and said to his companion: "John, there is something coming over me and I cannot tell what it is; help me to "GET OUT TO THE AIR."

The companion and another man carried the helpless sufferer from the house and to a street car, by which he was taken home. When he reached his home he was unable to make the slightest movement with his right limbs, and the entire side of his body was devoid of feeling. No amount of rubbing, pinching or pricking with sharp instruments made any impression on that

SIDE OF THE BODY AFFECTED.

The physicians who were called have been giving the case constant attention ever since and have succeeded in restoring a slightly perceptible feeling in the leg and arm. They say that it is a remarkable case for a strong man in the prime of life, and suppose it to have been caused either by an unusual tension brought to bear on his brain by temporary excitement while following the drama, or by a violent check to the circulation of blood caused by the position in which he had remained sitting, probably during the whole scene or act in the play.

Harvesting Snakes

Mr. J. E. Ridgway of South Branch, Monroe township, has harvested his crop of rattlesnakes. The other morning he went to the back part of his farm at South Branch to salt his sheep, and having done this concluded he would go farther back on the hill and pick up a few berries. His way led by a ledge of rocks and there he beheld, lazily basking in the sun's rays, an immense family of rattlesnakes. They were all lying on one big rock, and seemed in a torpid condition. A large number of them were grouped in one big bundle, intertwined, and the others were lying within a few feet of them in smaller groups. Mr. Ridgway at once fell back, procured a club eight or nine feet long, and went at them and succeeded in killing every one.

Rattlesnakes are easily killed and it was simply a job of pounding them to death. They seemed to be blind, and did not try to get away and did not show fight. This would go to corroborate the saying that for a time during the summer rattlesnakes become blind and are less dangerous. Most of the snakes were young ones and were everywhere from six inches to one feet in length. In the entire number there were seven large ones, and from these Mr. Ridgway took the rattles. One string of the rattles numbers eleven, three of them nine, one eight, and so on down. The record stands at seventy-five.

Improved Sailing Vessels.

Notwithstanding the improvements in steam navigation, transportation by sailing vessels is so much cheaper, that new experiments are being tested in wind-driven crafts. On the lakes, it has been found economical to use huge grain vessels, those which ply between Chicago and Buffalo, carry five masts. There is now building a five-masted schooner for salt water with a carrying capacity of 3,000 tons. The competition between Russia and America petroleum is making both nations do all they can to cheapen that useful and wonderful product of nature. While Americans have heretofore sent the refined oil to the rest of the world in barrels, the Russians have sent it out in bulk, making a large saving thereby. Several American vessels have been fitted up to carry oil to Europe also in bulk. As steam is costly and fire dangerous, it is proposed to build a six-masted schooner that will carry one hundred thousand cans of oil. Mineral oil, by the way, is very cheap. At last accounts, crude petroleum was selling at sixty cents a barrel. This is a remarkable boon to the poor of all countries, who have now a brilliant illuminant cheaper than was the old tallow dip.

The Dancing Dervishes of Pera.

Among the curious sights of Constantinople which nearly every traveller makes a point of visiting is the establishment of the Dancing Dervishes at Pera. The building in which these Dancing Dervishes perform their religious exercises does certainly not impress one with any idea of sacredness. It has a very common-place exterior, and inside resembles many "halls" on the Continent set apart for the exhibitions of acrobats and conjurers. On the floor of the hall is a circular place railed off, with a parterre beyond, and galleries above, while in a recess sit the musicians, whose singular instruments send forth those strange, monotonous sounds which constitute Turkish music. The leader or priest stands in the centre of the circle, and the dervishes—about twenty in number on the occasions when we have witnessed the performance—clothed in light gray flannel robes, made very full, and with grey felt hats like inverted flower-pots on their heads, and feet bare, spin round him in a kind of waltz. The left appears to be kept constantly on the floor, while the right foot is passed round rather than over it to effect the revolution. Each man keeps his hands out-spread, with his fingers pointing to the ground, or folded upwards across his breast, and whirls round like a spinning top, his garments extending almost horizontally from the hips.

Over the Ocean in Twenty-four Hours.

They are building a vessel in Pittsburgh, which is expected to reach New Orleans from that city in as short a time as it now takes to go to Cincinnati. An ocean ship modeled on the same plan would, it is expected, reach Southampton, England, from Halifax, Nova Scotia, in twenty-four hours. Mr. John Dougherty, of Mount Union, Penn., is the inventor of this marvelous craft. The vessel now under construction is to be 33 feet wide, 165 feet long on the water-line, and 175 or 180 feet long on deck, and will be built entirely of wood. Its weight without the engine will be about forty five tons, and when it has the engine and 250 passengers on board, its draft will be less than six inches. On each side of it will be two folding paddles, sinking deep into the water. The paddles will be open when going forward, so that they may move the largest possible body of water, but the change to the backward motion will, by the agency of springs close the paddles and thus reduce their resistance to a minimum. There will also be under the centre of the vessel two propelling poles, which are intended to drive the vessel through shoal water by striking the bottom of the river. Mr. Dougherty calculates that his patent will so greatly increase the speed of traffic on the river, that he will be able to make the trip from Pittsburgh to New Orleans and back in a week—the time now taken by the fastest boats to make the round trip to Cincinnati. He is confident that he will be able to reduce the time occupied in crossing the Atlantic by the shortest route, that from Southampton to Halifax, to twenty-four hours, and that from New York to Calcutta to ten days. So far steam navigation by land is much faster than steam propulsion by water; but there are several plausible inventions now being tested that may make water communication much more rapid than the swiftest trains run by locomotives. But what marvels are possible to modern science and invention. The child is living to-day, who will not only cross the ocean in one-third the time it now takes, but who will be able to circumnavigate the globe in an air-vessel.

A Great War Impending.

All the news from abroad indicates the near approach of the greatest international conflict known to history. The burning Eastern question is about to be re-opened, and Russia will again endeavor to drive the Turkish Sublime Porte out of Europe and capture Constantinople. This war if it commences will probably involve every continental power. So far as can be foreseen, Russia's only ally will be France, while Germany, Austria, and England will be united to beat back Russia's advance on Constantinople. England will have her hands full in guarding the frontiers of Hindoostan from the southern march of the Muscovite soldiers. The conflict in Central Asia will open by the seige of Herat by Russia. For countless ages that fortress has been the objective point of all the military powers which aimed at invading what are now the British East Indies. It has been looked upon as the open door to the Peninsula, the key of the military situation in Southern Asia. Should it fall, it will be ominous to the British power in Asia. Russia has one advantage over Great Britain in dealing with alien races. It is able to assimilate with and absorb a conquered people. For nearly a thousand years the Russian has been steadily pressing southward, and as one race after another was subdued they have been incorporated into and made a part of the Russian people. This is as true of the recent conquests in Central and Southern Asia, as it was when the Tartars and Cossacks around the Caspian Sea submitted to the authority of the Czar. England's policy has been different; it has conquered many nations in different parts of the earth; but has never intermarried with or treated as equal any save those of its own Caucasian race; hence the Englishman in India is isolated, and the Hindoos look upon him as an intruder and a usurper. This is what will give Russia the advantage, when the fight takes place for the possession of India. —Demorest's Monthly.

After Twenty-five Years.

A ship carpenter named Dwyer is employed in the New England Shipbuilding Company's yard, Bath. He has worked there some time. A day or two ago a lumber-laden schooner from the South arrived at one of the wharfs of the company. While the schooner was unloading her cargo Mr. Dwyer was assigned to the duty of marking the timber as it was landed on the wharf from the schooner. While attending to that work he heard his name called by one of the sailors on board of the schooner. He asked what was wanted, and was informed that it was meant for a sailor on board.

The ship carpenter a short time after turned his thoughts backward a number of years, and brought to mind the appearance of a brother whom he had not seen for twenty-five years. Could the man on the schooner, who was named Dwyer, be his brother? He sought the sailor, and in a brief space of time the men were shaking each other's hands in a vigorous manner. They were the long-separated brothers, both having sought different parts of the globe when young. For a few years after they heard from one another, but correspondence finally ceased, and each supposed the other dead.

The fact of the meeting of the two brothers after such a long absence soon became noised about the shipyard, and it was talked about a great deal by the workmen. It seems there is another man in the yard named Dwyer. He heard of the meeting. The two men were sought by him, and resulted in finding two brothers he had not seen for a lapse of twenty-five years, all three of the brothers having become separated about the same time. What seems almost incredible is the fact that two of the brothers have been employed in the same shipyard here for some time, and yet did not know each other as brothers till after the sailor—the third brother—made his appearance here.

"Paul," said his mamma, "will you go softly into the parlor and see if grandpa is asleep?" "Yes, mamma," whispered Paul, on his return; "he is all asleep but his nose.

"My good man," said a philanthropist to the street laborer, "do you ever have cause to grumble at your position?" "No, sir," was the answer; "I took my pick at the start."

Lady (in drygoods store)—"I will look at your material for towels." Clerk (recently transferred from the dress goods department)—"Yes, ma'am; something that won't show dirt?"

Thomas, our Irish hostler, emphasizes the doctrine that horse stalls should have earthen floors thus: "A horse should never stand on a wooden floor, except when he's lying down."

There are little, sweet, pretty and green oases all the way through the desert of life, but the fat man who breaks a suspender on a hot day when running to catch a train doesn't think of this.

"My dear," said Mrs. Snaggs to her husband, "what is a canard?" "Why, a canard is something one canardly believe, of course." "Oh, to be sure! Why couldn't I think of that?"

"Why, Mr. Harler, I didn't know you were baldheaded. You're awful young to be baldheaded," said Mrs. Hite. "Oh, I dunno. I've got a son not over two weeks old who is baldheaded."

"Father, why does the paper speak of Miss Cleveland's books as 'works?'" asked little Johnny. "Well, my son, if you should ever attempt to read one you will find out what hard work it is."

A little chap, told by his mother to say his prayers, and to ask for what he wanted, prayed "for one hundred brothers and fifty sisters." The mother hurried the little sinner off to bed before he could say Amen!

A minister made an interminable call upon a lady of his acquaintance. Her little daughter who was present grew weary of his conversation and whispered in an audible key: "Don't he bring his amen with him, mamma?"

The personalities of Kansas journalism reached a climax last week, when a brother heatedly advised a loathsome contemporary to keep his shirt on, and subsequently ascertained to his horror that the contemporary was a woman.

Female twin-soul—"Pardon my dishevelled appearance; I have but just come from the bath." Male twin-soul—"Ah! you bathe then!" Female twin-soul—"Yes." Male twin-soul—"Another habit in common. How sweet."

We saw a farmer caught in a barbed wire fence, the other day, confined by two prongs so that he could not stir either way. As we saw the same farmer putting up the accursed nuisance in the spring, we simply wept and passed by.

"Just threw me half a dozen of the biggest of these trout," said a citizen to the fish dealer. "Threw them?" queried the dealer. "Yes, and then I'll go home and tell my wife that I caught 'em. I may be a poor fisherman, but I'm no liar."

Eloping Twice with the Same Man.

Two years ago Miss May Conway was one of the most attractive girls in the little village of Texas, Baltimore county. She was not handsome, but bright and winsome, and the country beaus were drawn to her like bees to a honeysuckle. She appeared to be modest and good, and sang in the village church choir. She also taught a class in the Sunday school, and it was there she met her fate. Howard Poe, it is said, was a teacher in the same school. He was an industrious man, with no bad habits, and until he became too fond of his fair fellow teacher he was a devoted husband. He had been married some years, and his wife was an excellent lady. The conduct of Poe and Miss Conway soon became the talk of the village, and the discarded wife was terribly distressed. Finally, one Sunday after school, the couple disappeared. They came to Baltimore and put up at a hotel here. They then went to Washington, but in a few weeks they repented of their unholy love, and sought forgiveness of their relatives. He was received again by his wife, who forgave him and believed him thoroughly repentant. May was received into the bosom of her father's family as a prodigal daughter. From that time until about a month ago the exemplary conduct of Poe and Miss Conway silenced the tongues of the gossips. In all that time they were never seen in each other's company. They bowed whenever they met, but that was all. Recently, however, they were thrown into each other's society at several picnics, which Poe attended without his wife. The result was a revival of the old affections, which led to another elopement, and the couple are now living together near York, Pa. Mrs. Poe lives alone in Texas, supported by her own exertions and her husband's father.

Editorial Notes.

—Prince Albert Victoria, the eldest son of the Prince of Wales, is to marry an American.

—An effort was made at the Methodist Conference to lengthen the Ministers' term, and a resolution passed making it four instead of three years, but was afterwards reconsidered leaving the term three years as before.

—And now the fishery war is to be carried into Lake Erie. At least the attention of the Customs Deparment has been drawn to irregularities on an extensive scale committed by American vessels, and the Department is said to be on the point of enacting distinct regulations to cover the difficulty. If there were more distinct regulations in our Customs Department there would be fewer seizures.

—Our friend across the border who so lately laughed at the idea of a successful transcontinental railroad into Canadian soil have changed their tune. The shipment of goods from San Francisco for Chicago and New York via the Canadian route has knocked the eagle silly. Our neighbors are a right smart people but "John P. Robinson, he said they, did'n know everything down in Judee."

—Sir John Lubbock has interduced to the British Parliament a bill making the early closing of shops compulsory. The bill provides that all shops shall close at ten o'clock on holiday evenings and eight o'clock on other evenings. There is no good reason why all shopping should not be done ordinarily before eight o'clock in the evening, and there are many good reasons why young men and women should not be comfined in shops until a late hour every night.

—The General Conference Committee on Statistics presented the following report which is full of interesting figures. The membership of the church was placed at 197,479. There are 1510 ministers and probationers. The churches has property to the value of $9,895,043. The number of Sabbath Schools is 2575 with an attendance of 191,285. The total abstinence pledge has 46,280 names. Sabbath School papers have a circulation of 229,639.

—China and Japan annually import goods to the value of about twenty-four million pounds sterling. Cottons, woollens, sugar and metals all manufactured are the principal imports. It will be many years before either of these countries are able to support themselves with any of these manufactured articles to any great extent. Meanwhile the demand will increase as civilization progresses, a great and profitable market here opens for Canadian manufactures. While there is steady trade from Japan and China by way of Canadian Pacific, return freight ought to be low, and the Canadian factories ought to be able to compete with the whole world on very favorable terms for these markets. All that is needed is for our manufactures to acquaint themslves with the needs of the markets. This offers a fine opening for Canadian enterprise.

BE ALIVE ABOUT IT.

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." Why not be cheerful? It pays to keep posted on what's going on around you: A little recreation, a little interest outside of the humdrum cares of every-day life is good for the stomach as well as for the brain, a happy wife and happy cheerful children make a man's life more contented than a dull morose family without any interest in the world accept getting up in the morning, working hard all day and going to bed at night.

Since civilization came into being, nothing has done more to relieve the monotony of life, or afforded the general public such a view of the doings of the world both at home and abroad, as the newspaper. They are within the reach of all, and there is no country in the world which produces as large a percentage of intelligent readers as this Canada of ours. Every citizen should have first the local paper, and after that a leading city paper, and as many more as he can afford. The local papers of to-day are, with very few exceptions a credit both to the country and to their publishers. No family should be without it. A very intelligent man in this district says he considers the local paper worth at least four times as much to his family, in an educational point, as he can procure for them in any other way for the same cost, notwithstanding our prided free Public School system. There is such a variety of reading matter in the newspaper of to-day that all can find something suitable for their varied tastes; at the same time no reasonable person should expect never to see anything distasteful to their particular opinion; the wonder is, how local papers can give such a varied and interesting weekly budget of matter with so little which exception can be taken to.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsib'e for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

"It sometimes happens that a child is un-"truthful even when the home atmosphere is "truthful." This is the opening sentence of an article copied from the Christian at Work which appears in the "Presbyterian Review" of the 16th inst. in reference to which the undersigned respectfully asks permission thro' the colum ns of the STANDARD to offer a few remarks.

1. We emphatic ally deny the truth of that statement, it is contrary to experience, to common sense and to God's Word. "Train "up a child in the way he should go and "when he is old he will not depart therefrom" is the admonition of the wise King of Israel and which as the enunciation of a general truth has never yet been succeesfully controverted.

Of course there will in the very nature of things sometimes be exceptions to this general rule, but these as we are accustomed to say "only serve to prove the truth of the rule."

"What!" some one will say, "do you mean "to say that the child of pious God fearing "parents brot up in a truthful home atmos-"phere will not as a geueral rule become un-"truthful and profligate in after life?" Yes, that's just what I mean to say! You rarely find the child of truly pious parents who has been brot up in accordance with the word of God go far wrong in after life or bring the blush of shame to his parents' faces, and when you do find such a child you may be very sure that the supposed piety of his parents is only a mockery and delusion, a cloak of hypocrisy to blind the simple who can't discriminate between the false and the genuine.

2. It is a melancholy fact worthy of serious reflection that many children, children even of supposedly pious parents are habitually trained from their infancy to lying disobedience and deception together with all their kindred vices—faults and sins which we all admit are entirely incompatible with even our crudest notions of piety and godliness. Now, this is a sweeping charge, a charge at which doubtless many of your readers will stand aghast, and with upturned eyes and pious whim exclaim "God help us! who ever "heard the like of that," at which exclamation the writer can very fervently say "Amen" provided the prayer is offered in a right spirit and with an honest determination to do God's will in the important matter of training their children; remembering that "God only helps those who help themselves."

3. We have just said "that many suppos-"edly pious parents habitually train their "children to lying," &c. This statement requires some explanation if not slight modification. Of course no parent possessed of good sense and moral or religious sentiments would knowingly purposely put forth active effort to train his child to practice those abominable vices—still unconsciously the thing is done and done perhaps more effectually than if direct effort were put forth to accomplish the end. Children when young and before they have been taught by their foolish parents to lie and deceive are very innocent, trustful and confiding and unhesitatingly believe what "Pa" or "Ma" says without any question or manner of doubt until by experience they find out that "Pa" and "Ma" don't always speak the truth.

We should never forget that children, even when very young, are observant and imitative, quick to notice what is done or said in their presence, and are naturally, nay unconsciously influenced in thought, word and action by their environments; hence the wisdom, nay the great necessity that those who have the training of children committed to their charge should continuously observe the strictest harmony between their precepts and their examples.

The child has learned by experience that milk and sugar and candies, &c., are sweet and pleasant to the taste, and when sick his foolish mother will give him his first lesson in lying and deception. She prepares a dose of medicine, perhaps castor oil, and knowing that she has not taught the child habits of obedience, is obliged to resort to other means: hence she will proceed, "Now, sonny darling, "here's something nice, it's good; open your "mouth and swallow it down." The poor child believes his mother, swallows the dose and discovers, to his great horror, that it is not "good," that it was neither sugar nor honey nor any of the sweet things to which he had been accustomed, that in fact it was very nauseous and very bad; that in his mother had deceived him and told him a lie. Lesson No. 2 will begin very likely in this way: "Johnny, run and bring me the soap "till I wash your face." Johnny is engaged with his toys and pays no attention; his "ma" repeats the entreaty once or twice without success and finally adds, "Johnny "dear, bring me the soap and I'll give you a "candy." The bribe "fetches" him, the child runs with alacrity brings the soap, but lo when he returns there's no candy: his "ma" has told another lie and deceived the child into the bargain. Lesson No. 3 begins thus: "Johnny, put that plate up and bring me "some chips to start the fire." "I won't "send Tommy." Tommy now objects in turn, and the mother says "Now, Johnny, "I'll whip you if you don't bring the chips." The boy pays no attention, goes on twirling the plate, and the mother brings in the chips herself and just then calls to mind that as poor "Johnnie" had been lately sick she could not be so cruel as to keep her promise and whip him for disobediance as she had said. "Johnny" soon learns by experiance to distrust his mother's word and to dispise her threats, and very soon sets her authorit defiance, not forgetting to follow her example by lying and deceiving her in turn. We must not forget that this tender hearted mother who could not "bear" the thought of whipping her child is very likely to have a turn for pity, and may be one of those who in the presence of her neighbors appear very religious—may even persuade herself that she is good and pious and that because she teaches her children their "prayers" and prays with and for them very long and very ardently and admonishes them to love and fear God &c., &c. That therefore the "home atmosphere" is all that could be desired; while to our mind and way of thinking, such a "home atmosphere' is simply abominable and smells of perdition. Of which more anon.

From our own correspondent

Mr. W. L. B. Hamlin has removed from our village to Flesherton where he manages the business for R. J. Sproule, Esq.

Mr. Cyrus Field last week paid a visit to his friends in Brown City, Mich., he thought porhaps he might stay some time but he was not very favorably impressed with the country there, and so returned within a week. We are glad to see him back again.

Mr. D. A. Holman of Mono Road "Big Boot" establishment was up here on a business visit last Wednesday. Mr. H. likes Mono Road very well and is succeeding nicely. We wonder if he has seen "Bridget" lately.

Threshing is all the rage about here now. There are plenty machines too, as we have about eight or ten inside of five miles; of which three are "steamers." The crops turns out very well; one of our villagers last week from thirty acres had twelve hundred bushels of oats.

Mrs. W. E. D'Argent reached home last week after an extended visit to her friends in Kingston.

Mr. Alex Fleury of Stouffville Agricultural works is visitng his sister, Mrs. Thos. Gamey and other friends.

Many of the people about here paid a visit to the Industrial Exhibition last week, and nearly all returned with glowing accounts of it. One man, however, was quite sick on the way up.

I suppose you did not know that one of our merchants is wholesale, and supplies seme of our Flesherton men.

Mr. John Blakley was absent last week in Feversham taking the place of Mr. Charles Little who was sight seeing at Owen Sound, Toronto and other places.

Mr. Thomas A. Blakley of Flesherton has rented Mr. Wm. Guy's carriage shop, and in a little while will start a carriage shop in all its branches.

Miss Lillie Hamlin is now away on a visit in Owen Sound.

CHURCH OPENING.—The opening services of the New Babtist Chapel beautifully situated on the banks of the "Silver Water" on the north side of Toronto St. were held on Sunday last the 19th inst. The Chapel is a red brick building painted with white, in size adapted to the present wants of the congregation, and capable of giving comfortable accomodation to about 200 persons. Sermons were preached morning afternoon and night. In the afternoon the Rev. Mr. Wilson was expected to preach but owing to severe illness was not able to be present, upon the arrival of the Rev. Mr. Wilson, (Presbyterian Pastor here) to fill his own appointment here, he was invited to fill the vacancy which he readily concented to do, his own congregation going with him to the Baptist Chapel, and altho' not coming with a subject prepared for a special occasion such as church opening his audience was not dissapointed, from the words of Paul in the 13 and 14 verses of the 5th chapter of 2 Corinthians, he preached a soul stirring Gospel Sermon. In the evening the Rev. A. Grant of London preached selecting for his text the beautiful, verses 5 and 6 of the 137 Psalm, and in the evening the 4th verse of the 1st chapter of St. John's Gospel. I regret space does not permit me giving your readers a synopsis of these very interesting Sermons. The morning discourse was particularly eloquent and touching. "The Church the Lord's Cradle" its key note. The Sermon abounded in good points and useful lessons, so touching and heart softening that frequently provoked tear drops to chase each other down over the cheeks of many present. In the evening the same speaker from the text already quoted delivered a thoughtful and powerful discourse, "Life and light" the central thought. The church was packed to the doors. On Monday evening following a Tea was given, which was served in Mr. M. Richardson's old store, after which the people retired to the Gospel when a very interesting program was gone through, several speakers whose names were on the program were unable to be present, but their places were well filled. The first speaker, Rev. A. Wilson, delivered a very interesting address, his theme "Success." Next followed Dr. Christoe basing his remarks upon that great thing "Truth." The Dr. was listened to with very great interest. J. W. Henderson, Esq., of Toronto, being present, tho chairman called him forward when in a few minutes he gave some very interesting thoughts and practical suggestions. Then followed the speaker of the evening, Rev. A. Grant, who from the beginning carried his hearers with him, taking for his text "Church etiquette." The lecture abounded in wise maxims, and witty savings, frequently provoking the mirth of the audience. At the conclusion of a very humorous address the lecturer concluded by singing very sweetly a Solo. "The Jipsy lad," and then asked for subscriptions to provide for the balance of the debt upon the church. The building cost about $1,000, over $700 had already been subscribed, over $400 of that paid now. He asked for the amount that would clear the building of debt, the Sabbath collections over $50; and teameeting about $30. The people present in a short time responded to the amount required when all rose and sang twice "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." Mr. M. Richardson filled the chair during the evening in his well known racy and happy manner. The Baptist people here express themselves as deeply grateful and thankful to all those brethern and friends who so profitably ministered to them in their services.

STREET LAMPS.—What use are street lamps on a dark night when they are not lit up. I cannot see that they are ornamental, much less, useful. On Sunday night which was very dark, a stranger from one of our eastern cities was heard by your cor. to say, "well if the people of Flesherton who are such church going people cannot light their street lamps, the least they could do would be to set a lamp in each of their windows to light people on the side walks." Now, citizens, we have street lamps both gasoline and kerosene, light them, dont't have our tender feelings hurt again.

Meaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. T. A. Blakely of Flesherton has secured the contract of painting and calsomining the Wesley Church.

Mrs. W. Hutchinson has returned from King, where she had been visiting her friends for some time past.

How is this for quick work? Messrs Sparling and Ross with their steam thresher finished threshing at J. Warling's, moved one mile and a half to C. Brodie's, and were at work again inside of forty five minutes. If there is any others that can beat this record, let us hear from them.

Several of our citizens were down to Toronto last week taking in the sights of the city and exhibition, and rumor has it that some of them transacted some other important business.

HEADACHE BILIOUSNESS.—"Whenever I feel out of sorts, bilious, my liver not working right, or racked with a headache I take Chase's Liver Cure. There is more real benefit from one dose of your Liver Cure than in many bottles of some medicine."—John McNasser, Bond Head.

YOUNG FOLKS.

How Rosie Helped.

Her name was Rosalie; but she was such a little creature that it seemed more natural to call her Rosie.

Besides she was always among the roses. On this morning while her father talked with Dick, she hovered between the study and the flower garden, now gathering her flowers, now peeping her head into the study to see if papa was not almost through and ready to talk to her. She was shy of Dick; he was a new boy, had only been with them a few days, and papa more than suspected was not a good boy; so Rosie had strict orders not to visit him in the stable, or have any talk with him unless papa or some one else was within hearing. Only this morning papa had heard Dick use language which made him feel afraid that he ought not to keep him in his employ. Yet how sorry he was for poor orphan Dick, that nobody seemed to care for!

He tried to make him feel that he was his friend; tried to rouse him to want to be a man and to overcome his grave faults. "You are just the age of my boy Harris," Rosie heard her father say, "and he is just about your size. Harris is a grand boy; he never gave his mother an hour of anxiety, and I can trust him anywhere. I have such faith in his word that when he says a thing, I do not have to inquire into it, I know it is true. Isn't it worth while for a boy to have such a character as that? Don't you think you would enjoy hearing people say: 'That thing is so, you may depend on it, for Dick Saunders told me, and he is to be trusted, you know.'"

Dick shifted uneasily from one foot to the other, and his face seemed to be growing red over some feeling, Rosie's papa was not sure what. At last he said, "It is all very well for a boy like yours to be honest, and all that; why shouldn't he be? Look what chances he has had; and then look what chances I've had! Kicked and cuffed about the world all my life; nobody cares what becomes of me. I heard you pray for Harris this morning, and I thought of it then. There never was a person in this world who cared enough for me to make a prayer about me!"

What a strange boy Dick was! For a moment, Rosie's father did not know what to say. Just then Rosie, her head framed in the window, where she had been standing for a few minutes, her hands full of flowers, her face sweetly grave, spoke her troubled thought: "Didn't Jesus pray for you when he lived here? That time when he said 'Now I pray for all who shall believe on me?'"

Dick started so suddenly as to nearly overturn the little table on which he leaned, turned to the window, and looking steadily at Rosie, said hoarsely: "What do you mean?"

"Why, that time, don't you know? When he prayed for his disciples; then he said, 'neither pray I for these alone,' and after that he prayed for everybody who should ever live, who would love him and mind him. If you mean to mind him, he prayed for you, too, mamma told me. Don't you mean to mind him? Because it isn't nice to leave yourself out of his prayer."

Wise little Rosie! Papa said not another word. He thought Dick had gotten his sermon, text and all. Neither did Rosie say any more; she did not know she had preached a sermon.

She went away, humming,

> I am so glad that our Father in heaven
> Tells of his love in the book he has given.

Years and years after that, when Rosie was nineteen, one day she went to church in a city five hundred miles away from her childhood home, and she heard a man preach on these words: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for all them which shall believe on me through their words." It was a grand sermon; Rosalie Pierson thought she had never heard one more wonderful. At the close of service the minister came straight to her seat, held out his hand and said: "It was a blessed text, Miss Pierson; I never forgot the sermon you preached from it. I knew now that the Lord Jesus prayed for me that day. And I know that I believe on him through your words."

"Why!" said Rosalie, in astonishment, "I don't understand, this surely cannot be—"

"Yes," said the minister, "I am Dick."

THE EARTHQUAKE IN GEORGIA.

It is reported in Griffin that a leading counseler in the prohibition contest rushed from his house into the middle of the road in a single nether garment and yelled to his wife to come out, as the whisky men were blowing the house up with dynamite.

The Jury in the Gilbert Davis case, in Eastman, were in their room at the court house, unable to agree, and, it is said, there was no probability of their arriving at a verdict. After the earthquake was over they agreed in about three minutes.

The earthquake came near breaking up an inquest on Hutchinson's island. Capt. Dixon had crossed over to the island to investigate the death of Cyrus Campbell, an old negro, who was found dead in a cabin there at noon. The death was sudden, and no one was present, so the coroner concluded to summon a jury. After swearing them they were all told to take seats in the cabin. David Mere, a darky, was the only witness. He began giving his evidence, and had got about down to the time when Campbell was last seen, when the cabin commenced to rattle. "There she goes again," the witness said. His eyes grew double the ordinary size and he started for the door, leaving his evidence half finished. The juror nearest the door waited about half a second, and he gave a leap out. The other jurors gave one glance at the corpse and they saw it move. That was enough for them, and they went out in a bunch, leaving the coroner and the corpse to finish the inquest.

Dickens says: "No man hates himself." And it may be added that he doesn't need to. He will always find people—particularly those to whom he has extended favors—ready to take that job off his hands.

Tombstone dealer (to widow)—"Would you like the cause of your husband's death explained on the stone, madam?" Widow—"Well—er—perhaps it might be appropriate to engrave a couple of cucumbers on it, if you will."

GIRL WORKERS IN COAL PITS.

A Picture of Underground Life in the Realm of King Leopold.

A young unmarried girl of 17 said in reply to questions: "My work in the coalpits begins at 5 o'clock in the morning and ends between 9 and 11 at night. I load from sixty to seventy cars every day, and I earn 2 francs (20d.) a day. I went regularly to school from my eighth to my twelfth year. I could read once, but I have forgotten it all now. Pit work ought to be prohibited for girls."

Upon being pressed more closely by the President she said it ruined the morals of every good-looking girl. "The overseers bribe the prettiest girls by giving them the best paid work."

A married woman said: "The week before last my husband earned 13 francs (11s.) He had never earned a larger sum in a week. It is impossible for us to live on such a wage. When I have bought our food and firing the whole wage is spent; it is not enough to cover rent and clothing."

The mother of a family replied: "I scarcely know the taste of meat."

Another young girl said that her working day in the pits began at 4½ or 5 A. M. and closed at 11 P. M., for which she received 1 franc 80 centimes to 2 francs. A younger sister left off work at 6 P. M., but she only earned 1 franc 50 centimes (1s. 3d.) Nearly all the girls volunteered, in almost the same words, the emphatic statement, "Girls ought not to be allowed to work in the pits;" and they were unanimous in their complaint of the temptations put in their way by the overseers.

The President asked each of them. "What nourishment do you have? Do you often take meat?"

One girl replied: "Three months ago we had some meat on our table; I have never tasted any since." Another said: "I take a bottle of water with the fruit every morning; I cannot afford coffee."

The President asked an old workman who had spent his life in pits why no effort had been made by them to bring their condition before the notice of the public. "I would gladly have given evidence," said he, "but I knew that I should be dismissed if I told any story about the works. My comrades have urged me to speak for them, as I have had so long an experience. But I was afraid to do it."

His present wages are 2 francs a day (1s. 8d) When he was younger and stronger he used to earn the sum 2 francs 50 centimes a day.

The President inquired if the workers found regular wages or piecework more profitable.

"The day wages is miserable," said the old man, "but piece work is no better, for if the overseers find that a man earns more by piece work, the terms are at once lowered.

One of the working-class leaders, who was examined at great length by the President and Commissioners, denied that the work folk were Socialist revolutionaries. They will follow any leader in their despair, but their own actual demands are very simple. The President asked him to formulate as shortly as possible the real programme desired by the workingmen and women in the pits.

Speaking of the employment of children, he said: "We want the work day for children limited to eight hours, and their wages fixed as follows: Children of 12 to 13 years, 1 franc 20 centimes a day of eight hours; from 13 to 15 years, 1 franc 60 centimes; 15 to 17 years, 2 francs.

The President—Then you would not abolish child labor?

"We would not abolish families. My family consists of nine persons, only three of us earning anything. We have to keep six who are not earners. The united yearly income of the three of us who are workers is 1,500 francs."

The President asked if they would not like their children to go to school after the twelfth year.

"No," replied the workman; "it is not possible for the parents to wait until a long school term is ended, as the family needs the wages of the elder children. We have not only to keep our young children, but also our old people. After his fiftieth year a man can earn little in the pits, and is usually dismissed."

This speaker—whom the workers were particularly anxious to have examined, as he is in good repute both as a workman and an orater—told the Commissioners that the average weekly wages of the head of a household in full work is from twelve to fourteen francs. "I need not say that a family cannot live upon that; the wife must work when she can, the children as soon as they can."

A married woman, who had been a worker in the coal pit, said: "I am the mother of six children. We are very poor; but I would rather starve than that one of my girls should go to work in the pits. The overseers use all means in their power to ruin the girls. If nothing else succeeds, they will put a timid young girl to work in a solitary place until she is terrified."

When she was asked what wage her family earned, she replied that her husband had thirteen francs a week, and one of her sons eighty centimes a day.

To the question as to the food of the family, she said: "Every Sunday and Thursday I buy a pound of meat; on all other days we live on potatoes and bread."

"You are making yourself rather officious in this crowd," said a burly policeman to a notorious pickpocket. "I am only trying to disperse them," said the thief.

"That's what I call hush money," remarked the daddy when he planked down the cash for a bottle of paregoric to take home for use in the infantile portion of the family.

"Do you think I'm a simpleton, sir," thundered a fiery Scotch laird to his new footman. "Ye see, sir," replied the canny Scot, "I'm no lang here, an' I dinna ken yet."

A old Mississippi pilot tells that the affection exhibited by Mark Twain and his venerable mother, now a resident of Keokuk, Iowa, is very refreshing. She always had firm faith in her son Samual, and says of him: "He was always a good boy, Samual was, though prone to be mischievous. He's always the same to me—the best son a mother ever had."

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

Early in the week each native member of the Lime-Kiln Club received a copy of the following notice:

"FIRE! POLICE! YUM!"

You are hereby notified that the Lime-Kiln Club, which has been on a vacation for the past two months, will resume business at Paradise Hall on Saturday evening at the regular hour. Every member who can walk is expected to be on hand at least five minutes before the triangle sounds. No dogs allowed in the hall, as usual. Owners of umbrellas will bring them at their own peril. The password at the second landing will be: "Azure Skies." Anyone having books belonging to the Library will please return them at this meeting.

BRO. GARDENER, Pres.
WAYDOWN BEEBE, Sec.

When the meeting opened 312 members answered to roll call, and Elder Toots delightedly remarked to Samuel Shin that it did him good to see the general abandon which seemed to have taken root in every breast. When the triangle sounded Brother Gardner arose and said:

"My frens, two months ago, at de airnest inculcashuns of a majority of de members of dis club, I decided to adjourn de meetin's frew de space of July an' August. I had grave doubts as to de propriety of sich a step, but yielded to de pressure. De result has bin what I anticipated. Dis kentry has almost bin plunged into war, de fishery queshun am still on ebjick of nashunal dispute, an' storms an' disasters hev bin rampant all ober de United Staits. Bizness has bin grievously neglected. People who depended on dis club hev had deir confidence shooken. We mus' at once git back to reg'lar purceedins, and purceed to grapple wid an' obercome de live topics of de hour.

"When dis club was organized we had our annual 'lockshun an' club picnic on de fust Saturday to oblige de Concord Skule of Philosophy. Den we changed it agin to oblige de emancipashun people of Michigan an' Canada, an' I has now determined to make a third change. Owing to de fack dat de turnip, carrot an' watermelyon am not at deir best in dis climbate until September, an dat mustard an' pickles, which play sich important parts in our banquets, do not begin to develop deir flavor until along about de anniversary of Perry's victory, it has been deemed best to set de time fur de picnic at one week from to-day. I has been in correspondence wid many of our honerary members an' am ashured of a large attendance. Canada will be represented by ober 100 delegates, an' ebery Stait in de Union will send its delegashun. De place of de banquet will be on Fighting Island, eight miles below de city. We shall have de usual games, wid de usual prizes, an' I trust dat ebery local member will do his lebel best to inoculate a reprehensible time.

HE WAS THERE.

The Rev. Penstock was on hand and in his usual seat, and the President had no sooner finished than he arose and inquired;

"Did I understand de cha'r to say dat we should inoculate a reprehensible time?'

"You did, sah!" was the prompt reply

"Will de cha'r please explain his meaning a little clearer?"

"Brudder Penstock," said the President as he arose and vigorously rapped the desk with his mallet, "dis cha'r has nuffin to explain. If dar am any member present who hasn't studied arithmetic long 'nuff to understand what de inoculashun of a reprehensible time means, den it would be fur better fur de rest of us if he would collegiate to'rds implacable oblivion."

Penstock didn't collegiate. He sat down and hugged a crushed strawberry to his aching bosom.

COMMITTEES.

The following committees were then appointed:

Reception of Delegates—Giveadam Jones, Pickles Smith and Trustee Pullback, with authority not to hire more than five mules and wagons.

On the Banquet—Sir Isaac Walpole, Whalebone Howker, Elder Cantiff and Col. Cabeets, with instructions to canvass the city for provisions.

On Games—Shindig Watkins, Elder Toots, Hartshorn Davis and Old Man Scott.

On Election—Rev. Penstock and Uncle Beggs.

INCIDENTAL.

The delegates will begin arriving about Thursday, and as fast as they come in they will be escorted to Paradise Hall, furnished with a lunch of iced tea, and then distributed among the cabins of local members. Any citizen having a barn not in use which can be secured for temporary lodgings will please address the Secretary of the club, stating the hight between joists, condition of floors and roof, etc.

So far as is known there will be no opposition to Brother Gardner's seventh re-election, although some of the minor positions will be objects of contest.

The Building Committee has been busy during the summer in estimating improvements. The Library is to be enlarged to hold 10,000 more almanacs, two bunches of shingles will be used on the roof of the hall, and it is designed to lay a new floor in the museum.

Such delegates as may arrive on foot by highway and not find members of the reception committee at the various toll-gates, will ask the nearest policeman to guide them to Paradise Hall. No delegates without credentials will be received.

Equal to Him.

Waiter Girl (to commercial traveller)—"There's roast beef and roast duck."

Commercial Traveller—"Canvas-back duck?"

Waiter Girl—"Yes."

Commercial Traveller (facetiously)—"Is it shirred down the front with lace cuffs turned back over the sleeves, Mary?"

Waiter Girl—"The same."

Commercial Traveller—"I will try some of it, I guess."

Waiter Girl—"Very well, sir. Will you have it with or without?"

Commercial Traveller—"With or without what?"

Waiter Girl—"Battens."

A frigid smile—Iced champagne.

HERE AND THERE.

An Andover hen recently laid an egg in which were four perfect soft-shell eggs.

An Episcopal Church in Minneapolis has since the opening of the exposition had these words in bold letters over the door: "Church open. Come in, rest and pray." It is noticed that a good many persons do go in every day.

Indian belles of Alaska wear a thick coating of oil and soot on their faces when not in full toilet. This is said to preserve the complexion, which, after a thorough scrubbing, looks as fair and smooth as a good article of soft soap.

A Dakota farmer, grumbling at the poor outlook for wheat in the early summer, offered to give his wife all the wheat he would have over 1,500 bushels. He has just threshed a trifle over 2,500 bushels, and the wife is going to have a new black silk dress.

A colporteur of the American Bible Society found in Riley, Wis., the other day the son of a clergyman who had no Bible in his house. He wouldn't buy one and wouldn't accept one as a gift, and when the colporteur intimated that he'd leave one any way the bad man became very angry and put the Bible man out of the house.

A South Norwalk woman who took gas the other while she had teeth drawn, instead of regaining consciousness after the operation remained insensible and began to bloat rapidly. Her face, body, and limbs swelled alarmingly; but when a doctor was called, who ripped off her tight clothing and relieved the pressure, she soon recovered. Dentists say the case is a very rare one.

Twelve years ago John Wendell went West, leaving his three-year-old boy with relatives in Milton, N. H. Nothing being heard of Wendell, the boy was finally sent to the almshouse until he was 12 years old, when he was bound out to a farmer. A few weeks ago a letter was sent from Lincoln, Ill., to Milton, saying that Wendell had died there, leaving $25,000 to be divided between a daughter by a second marriage and his son in New Hampshire. The boy has started West to look after his legacy.

The New York Independent insists that it is true that a prominent trustee in one of the largest churches in New England successfully opposed the inauguration of revival meetings on the ground that such a meeting would destroy their new church carpets. "Besides," he is reported to have said: "what do we want with a revival? We are out of debt; our pews are all rented; our house is full, and a revival would only disturb the quiet and orderly development of the church."

A few weeks ago two young persons went rowing on White Bear Lake, Minn., and the young woman trailed her hand in the water and thus lost a ring. A week afterward the same couple were again out rowing and the gentleman saw the ring lying on the hard bottom of the lake covered with ten feet of clear water. He dropped his knife by the side of the ring to mark the spot, rowed the young woman to the shore, and while she hid in the bushes he rowed back, stripped, dived, and got both ring and knife.

Henry Blevins of Poplar Bluff, Mo., while squirrel hunting heard a pig squeal as if in great distress. He went toward the sound and saw a big bear just in the act of squeezing the last squeal out of poor piggy. Mr. Blevins's gun was not loaded for b'ar, but he found in his pocket a No. 1. buckshot. This he rolled in paper until the wad just fitted the gun, rammed it home on top of the squirrel shot, aimed at the bear's head and pulled the trigger. The aim was true, the buckshot did its work, and the bear fell dead.

They get along fast in Dakota, and to prove it a story is told of a recently elected Judge. He had been a sort of free lance in his profession, and had incurred the enmity of a certain lawyer. This lawyer came before the Judge the other day with an ordinary motion which should have been granted in due course of law. But it wasn't. "Motion denied," yelled the Judge. "But, your Honor——" "Motion denied, I say." "Your Honor, one word, if you please." "Not a word, sir." Your Honor seems to have a prejudice against me." "You're just right I have," said the Judge. "I've been laying for you for the past three years, and you don't get any motions in this court."

Twenty-two years ago Patrick Driscoll, just arrived from Ireland, found a pocket-book containing over $150 in Salem, N. J. He told his employer, who advised him to keep it until the owner appeared. The other day Charles W. Dunn happened to speak in the presence of Mr. Driscoll, now a prosperous merchant, about his brother Samuel Dunn, now dead, losing a pocket-book years before. Mr. Driscoll at once took a book from his pocket and handed it to Mr. Dunn, who identified it as the one his brother had lost. He was asked to count the money. There was just $151 78. Mr. Dunn tried to get Mr. Driscoll to keep the money, but he refused. He said it was a load off his mind to get rid of that $151.78.

An Understanding Wanted.

A merchant who was taking baking-powder in bulk from a firm, called at headquarters the other day to say that there was something wrong with the goods.

"I don't think so," was the reply, "we make the best article sold."

"I think we ought to have a more perfect understanding," continued the dealer. "Now, you adulterate before you send to me, then I adulterate before I despatch, then the retailer adulterates before he sells and the consumer can't be blamed for growling. I wanted to see if we couldn't agree on some plan to be followed."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, suppose you put in 10 percent of chalk, then I put in 20 percent of whiting, then the retailer puts in 30 percent of flour; that gives the consumer 40 percent of baking-powder, and unless he's a born hog, he'll be perfectly satisfied. You see if you adulterate 50 percent on the start, and I adulterate as much more, and the retailer adulterates as much as both together, it's mighty hard for the consumer to tell whether he is investing in baking powder or putty. We must give him something for his money, if it's only chalk."

HEALTH.

Milk for the Children.

Keep the child's milk separate from [illegible] intended for the rest of the household. [illegible] ready a pan that has been properly [illegible] by being thoroughly washed and [illegible] again in a solution of bicarbonate of [illegible] to receive the milk. In hot weather [illegible] milk should be placed on the fire and [illegible] temperature be brought to a point [illegible] of boiling—do not let it boil. It should then be put in a proper receptacle [illegible] placed in a cool place, or a refrigerator which does not contain vegetables. [illegible] should then be prepared as follows: [illegible] one-half pint; pure water, one half [illegible] powdered sugar of milk, one half teaspoonful; phosphate of lime, one grain. Dissolve the sugar and lime in water and add to the milk. This is the nearest approach to human milk that can be prepared. As the child grows, add less water. A good rule is this: Until one month add two parts water; one half water until three months, one-third water until the sixth month, one-fourth until the ninth month and so on until one year of age, when the child may take the milk clear, and often in addition with some of the infant food upon the market. The water should be boiled and allowed to cool before using, as this will purify it by destroying any germs it may contain. Some will no doubt ask why we peptonize the milk. During high temperature, when the mercury ranges from 86 to 100 degrees, there is rapid decomposition of milk, the casein is rapidly coagulated, and in this condition it exerts a peculiar action (antagonistic) upon the other solids of the milk, particularly upon the sugar, forming lactic acid. The milk loses its alkaline reaction and becomes sour, when it is not fit for further use. The heating of the milk retards this process.

Dietetic Fallacies.

1 That there is any nutriment in [illegible] made from extracts. There is none whatever.

2 That gelatine is nutritious. It will not keep a cat alive. Beef-tea and [illegible], however, possess a certain reparative power, we know not what.

3 That an egg is equal to a pound of meat, and that every sick person can eat them. Many, especially those of nervous bilious temperament, cannot eat them; and to such, eggs are injurious.

4 That because milk is an important article of food, it must be forced upon a patient. Food that a person cannot endure, will not cure.

5. That arrow-root is nutritious. It is simply starch and water, useful as a preventative, quickly prepared.

6 That cheese is injurious in all cases. It is, as a rule, contra-indicated, being usually indigestible; but it is concentrated nutriment, and a waste repairer, and often craved.

7. That the cravings of a patient are whims and should be denied. The stomach often needs, craves for, and digests articles not laid down in any dietary. Such as, for example, fruit, pickles, jams, cake, ham, or bacon with fat, cheese, butter and milk.

8. That an inflexible diet may be marked out, which shall apply to every case. Choice of a given list of articles allowable in a given case must be decided by the opinion of the stomach. The stomach is right, and theory wrong, and the judgment admits an appeal.

A diet which would keep a healthy man healthy, might kill a sick man; and a diet sufficient to sustain a sick man would not keep a well man alive. Increased quantity of food, especially of liquids, does not mean increased nutriment; rather, decrease, since the digestion is over-taxed and weakened. Strive to give the food in as concentrated a form as possible. Consult the patient's stomach in preference to his cravings; and if the stomach rejects a certain article, do not force it.

Prevention of Cancer.

The predisposing causes of cancer are in the habits of the patients themselves. Just as civilization is the cause of the strain that wrecks so many intellects, so it is also the cause of depressing the animal vitality of the individual, and brings in its train this dread disease. The main cause of this disease is "established wealth and a strain of luxury. The appetite for eating meat and highly seasoned food is indulged, and can be regularly and habitually indulged, only in a state of established civilization, with communities engaged in accumulating fortunes and vieing with each other in sumptuous living." These conditions, together with habits of indolence and insufficient exercise, cause an accumulation of the waste products in the system which predisposes to cancer. Then an accidental bruise, or reversal of fortune, with mental depression, or any other exciting cause, may develop this terrible disease.

The lesson is obvious. People should live more frugally and take plenty of exercise in the open air, and in short, follow hygienic modes of living, and the danger of cancer is much more remote. The cure may be difficult, but prevention seems to be in the power of the individual.

Cutting a Fork out of a Stomach.

A novel and dangerous operation has just been performed in Paris by Dr. Polaillon. The patient was a mountebank named Lachon, who, in the pursuit of his calling, swallowed a large fork, which stuck fast in his stomach. It was in vain that he tried to get his fingers down to the tips of the fork, so he had to leave it there, in the hope that no harm would ensue. In a few days, however, he felt acute pain particularly when his stomach was without food. Dr. Polaillen was unable to find the position of the fork by means of the ordinary sounding instrument, as he employed another, with which he contrived to touch the prongs. He then made an incision in the man's abdomen and extracted the fork. In his report to the Academy on the subject, Dr. Polaillen enumerates fourteen cases of a similar kind, in seven of which the fork only formed an abscess in the stomach.

"Her age is telling on her," remarked Quarle to Sanderson as an old-time schoolmate passed. "Yes, but she will never tell on her age," retorted Sanderson.

The Old Man Settled the Question.

BY HENRY HARRIMAN.

A lady sat in her cushioned chair,
Chewing away on her gum;
Her curls and curls were so tight in her hair
That the pain was too awfully some.

Now ever she expected her lover to come,
And loosened the bangs of her hair;
Then from her sweet mouth she ejected the gum
And tossed it aside on a chair.

The lover he came as the twilight fell
And smiled on the maiden so fair;
He clasped her and held her a good little spell.
Then sat himself down in a chair.

The lover waxed warm and warm waxed the wax,
And he drummed a te doodle de dum.
He was stuck on the girl, and alas and by Jacks!
He was stuck on that horrible gum!

And thus the youth reasoned, with mind all a rack,
And his thoughts all mixed in a whirl:
Is it better to carry the chair on his back
Or leave his best pants with the girl?

At the old man settled the question for him,
As he twined his long claws in his hair,
And hustled him out of the door with a vim—
And hustled the lover off with the chair.

Shall She Be Sacrificed?

CHAPIER I.—OUR MYSTERIOUS NEIGHBORS

In the little town of Spannere, in a semi-detached villa, lived my Aunt and I. My profession was that of a docter, my practice being large for a young man of only twenty five. The next house had been long unoccupied. Wooden palings divided its garden in the back and front from ours. The garden, however, was totally uncared for. The grass, unmown for many months, was long and straggling, and overstrewn with decayed leaves, which no one ever thought of removing. Near the gate was a black board supported on a pole, on which was painted in large staring characters, "To be Let, Furnished or Unfurnished, or Sold. Inquire at Mr. Bleggs, House Agent, 15 Corn Row." The same information was exhibited in the cobwebbed windows. The owner had been abroad for some time, and possessed a few other houses besides this in the town. At first the rent was fifty pounds per annum. No one would give that for it. It was then lowered to forty, and lastly to thirty-five pounds. Two or three times I noticed people stopping at the gate; but the outward appearance of the villa was so unprepossessing and untidy, that no one cared to take it, and thus it remained unlet for upwards of two years. It was an eyesore to me and to my aunt; for our side being so neat, and our little garden so flourishing and gay, the the contrast was all the more painful. One spring morning, as I was gathering some violets for the breakfast-table, to my agreeable surprise I observed a gardener clearing away the long unswept leaves, and preparing to mow the long neglected grass. He touched his hat on seeing me. I asked if the house was let. He replied that it was, and that the new comers would take possession in a few days. They had purchased the old furniture for a song—so he had heard—and had taken the house by the month.

A pleasing change was soon visible in the outward appearance of the place. The windows were cleaned and made bright and shining. Behind them were hung new green venetians, and the door was freshly painted. The dust within the building, the accumulation of many months, must have been great. Indeed, in hyperbolic language, the charwoman told our cook, who told my aunt, who told me, that there was dust enough to bury a man. I can imagine that the statement could not have been far from the truth. I should not like to be the unfortunate charwoman; I hope she was well paid for her trouble. About a week after, as I was in my surgery, at eleven o'clock at night, I heard a cab stop. I went to the window, and shading my face against the panes, looked out; but the darkness was too great to permit me to observe the newcomers.

The next morning, our neighbors, sent their compliments, asking us to lend them a few coals, which my good aunt gladly did. We ascertained that the fresh arrivals were a young orphan lady, and her sole servant, a housekeeper. The former's name, we were told, was Colebrooke. This was the only information my good aunt could give our acquaintances when they made inquiries. Several people called and left cards; but none were admitted, and so my aunt thought it would be useless for her to call, especially as we learned that the lady returned no visits. This gave occasion for much speculation and gossip among the chatterboxes of Spanners, which was one of those places where every one knows every one, and every body's affairs are canvassed and commented on by the community in general. Miss Colebrooke was a new inhabitant; no one knew her, nor anything about her; and so folks were curious, and being curious, talked. It thus happened that before I saw her, I felt a kind of interest in her. For about three weeks she never went out at all. What a lonely life hers must be, I thought, knowing none, except one old servant. Such a strange thing too it was, for a young girl to live thus by herself. Had she no relations? The postman never left a letter at her door. What a lot to be left thus friendless and desolate in the wide world!

I caught my first glimpse of her from our breakfast room window as she was walking in the back garden one morning. I was at once struck by the elegance of her form. But her face—when I saw that, I felt drawn to her at once, it was so sweet and pure; and there was such a depth of sadness in her soft, liquid, dark gray eyes! She could not have been more than eighteen or nineteen, as far as I could judge. When she caught my eye, she blushed vividly, and quickly turned away her face, as if not caring to be seen.

The next time I saw her was in church; but she wore a thick black veil, and it was not possible to see her features distinctly. I observed many people eyeing her inquisitively. She had taken a seat with her housekeeper, at the end of the church, amongst the free seats, and behind a pillar; so those who were rude enough to stare had to turn round. Don't think I did so. I glanced at her when I entered the church, but not again. I could perceive she was embarrassed by the curiosity of her fellow-worshippers.

Several weeks passed away, but we and our neighbours became no better acquainted. Occasionally, but that was not often, I saw her either in the garden or at the window; but she never walked out except on Sundays to church. Every morning the housekeeper went into the town to purchase the food for the day. I never noticed any tradesman call at the door; ready-money was paid for everything bought. This circumstance only increased the inquisitiveness of the Spannerites. I persuaded my Aunt to call one day, but she had no better luck than others who had done so. The servant told her that her young mistress received no one. The act of courtesy was unreturned.

Some weeks after this, when my Aunt had gone to bed, and I was preparing to do the same, I heard a faint, hesitating ring at the night-bell. Thinking it might be a summons to a patient, I opened the door myself, and was surprised to see Miss Colebrooke.

"You are the Doctor, I think?" she said rather timidly.

"Yes. Can I be of any service to you?" I required.

"My servant has been taken very ill with bronchitis. Will you kindly come and see her?"

I said I would come immediately; and putting on my hat, followed her down the steps and into the house. The servant was indeed seriously ill; and the attack was sharp and dangerous. I prescribed the necessary remedies, and left the room, promising to return in the morning.

Miss Colebrook followed me to the door. "Is it very serious?" she asked anxiously.

"In such cases," I replied, "there is always a certain amount of danger; but I hope, with care, that she will recover."

"I hope so, too, Doctor. I don't know what I should do if anything happened to her;" and the tears rose to her beautiful eyes.

"Would it not be as well," I said, "that you should have a nurse to attend her? I could recommend you one."

"Thank you; but I must nurse her myself," she said quickly. "But, yes; I forgot," she added after a moment, as if recollecting something. "I must have some one to attend to the house and go to the town for me."

"Just so. Then I will send you a servant to-morrow. Mrs. Stonewall, my Aunt, can recommend her highly."

"You are very kind, sir; but"——

I waited for her to continue. "Yes?" I said, seeing she did not conclude her sentence.

"I was thinking," she answered hesitatingly, "that she cannot sleep at her home."

This struck me as strange, as there were enough rooms in the house—which was built on the same plan as ours—for visitors as well as servants.

But without questioning her, I said I would request the person to sleep at her own house, and departed.

Mrs. Thompson—which was the housekeeper's name—was worse the next day. Her mistress was in a state of feverish anxiety about her. When the woman I recommended came, she was told that she need not attend to the top rooms, as they were locked. While I was there, Miss Colebrooke went to one of these rooms, and I fancied I heard her say something in a low remonstrating tone. Could she be speaking to herself? I wondered. But later in the day I found the rooms above had an inhabitant, and one whom no one guessed could be there. In the afternoon, as I was passing to the hall door, I looked up on hearing a swift movement above me. I wondered to see looking at me over the balustrade on the top landing the face of a man, beardless and whiskerless, with only a thick black moustache on his lip. He withdrew his head hastily when he saw I had noticed him. Who could he be? I resolved not to raise Miss Colebrooke's suspicions by asking questions, but during my visit that evening, she looked at me very uneasily and inquiringly as if she expected me to question her about the man, who I fancied must have told her that I had seen him. But she said nothing, nor did I.

For the next three days Mrs. Thompson continued in a very critical condition. On the fourth I saw an improvement, and on telling Miss Colebrooke so, had the pleasure of seeing the first bright smile on her pretty face. "I am so glad," she said hopefully. "You think then she will get over it? Please, say so."

I said so, but added that the patient must be very carefully attended, and every precaution taken to prevent her catching increased cold, which would certainly prove fatal. She asked when I thought Mrs. Thompson could leave her room. I replied, that it was impossible to say.

"You are looking tired with watching," I added. "I hope you allow the new maid to take turns in watching by Mrs. Thompson?"

"She does a little in the daytime."

"But why not let her take turns in watching at night?" I pursued. "It must, I am sure, fatigue you. Want of sleep always exhausts the human frame."

"Oh, I am strong, Doctor. I can do it."

"Well, take care then," I said as I went to the door, "that I do not have to doctor you as well as Mrs. Thompson; and then we must have a regular hospital nurse."

"I hope not," she returned smiling. "That would be a misfortune."

I told my aunt what I had said to Miss Colebrooke, and with her never failing kindness, she offered to help in the watching, and I gave Miss Colebrooke the message the next time I saw her.

"How very good of your aunt," she said gratefully. "I feel her kindness very much, the more so, as we are quite strangers; and——"

"And," I concluded, "I may therefore tell her that her proposal is accepted. You will know her at once, and no one knowing her could help liking her. She would be a friend to you."

"She must be a charming person, Doctor."

"Well I will tell her then that she can come this evening."

"Oh, please do not! I"—— She spoke quickly, in an embarrassed tone. "But I must watch by Mrs. Thompson myself at night. Do tell Mrs Stonewall how very much obliged I am to her."

"Then, Miss Colebrook, if you would rather watch by night, you must let her take turns with you in the daytime. I assure you it won't put her out. It will be a pleasure to her."

This was more favorably received. After some hesitation she consented; and during the day, I brought my aunt in and introduced her. I saw they took a mutual fancy to each other, of which I was glad. My Aunt pitied the apparently friendless girl, who seemed to have no one to care for her but the sick housekeeper. She felt drawn towards her, as I had been, when she saw the gentle, beautiful face, and divined as I had done, that the young heart hid a sorrow the nature of which we did not know. And on her part—and who could not help it?—was attracted by my dear Aunt's kindly smile, her sweet sympathizing words, as well as by her dear loving old face, pretty still, in spite of sixty summers, and many cares and troubles which had furrowed the brow, that had once been the smoothest and fairest. She stayed the whole afternoon with Mrs. Thompson, and gently insisted upon the young girl taking rest while she did so.

CHAPIER II.—IS HE MAD?

Several days passed away, and Miss Colebrooke soon became quite fond of my Aunt. Mrs. Thompson improved; and I rejoiced at this, especially for her young mistress's sake. Twice during the next week the mysterious stranger made his presence known. Once I caught sight of him at one of the upper windows at the back of the house, peeping stealthily behind the blind; and another time, the hall-door having been by accident left ajar, I had walked up-stairs without giving notice of my arrival, when I again saw him suddenly disappear up the stairs. It was in the evening, after the maid had gone home. But still I said nothing to Miss Colebrook about it. I thought it was not my place to question her, being a comparative stranger; but I felt extremely inclined to do so. That there was some mystery connected with her, was evident enough. What it was, I could only conjecture. It might be that she had made a runaway marriage, abetted by Mrs. Thompson, and which circumstances rendered necessary should be kept secret. I could not bear to think of this; but an incident that occurred a few days later strengthened my suspicion.

My last evening visit had been paid to the patient. It was past eleven; and I was standing at the open window of my bedroom, looking out on the night, which was very starry, but moonless, when I heard voices below in the next garden, and distinguished two dark figures.

"I must take a walk out to-morrow. I tell you, Ida, I shall die moping up in that room all day, and you being obliged to be so much with Mrs Thompson makes me lonelier than ever. I want exercise."

"Hush! Don't speak so loudly; you will be heard. Listen to me. For my sake, do remember;" and here her voice sank, so that I did not catch the conclusion of her speech. It was Miss Colebrooke who spoke. They could not see me, though I saw them. I waited for more.

"Yes, yes," he replied to whatever it was she had said to him. "I know that, my darling. Have they said anything about having seen me?"

I did not hear her answer. But presently I heard her sob, and he put his arm round her and kissed her, and then drew her gently into the house.

That was all; but it was enough to confirm my ideas. I cannot describe what I felt. No one could have known her for a fortnight, as I had, without having their peace of mind disturbed. I need not say that I slept very little that night; and I did not wonder at my Aunt telling me at breakfast, next morning, that I was not looking well. Before paying my next visit to the housekeeper, I had made up my mind to tell Miss Colebrooke what I had seen. It would put my suspense at an end to know the truth.

"Miss Colebrooke," I said to her rather abruptly as she was walking down the hall passage with me, "you are married, I believe?"

She started, and stared me in the face in complete astonishment, and then burst into a low musical laugh.

I had never heard her laugh before, and I liked to hear it; it gave me a certain hope too. "Why do you laugh?" I asked. "Am I not right?"

"How can you think I am married?" she said.

"My thought is wrong, then?"

"Indeed, it is. If I am married, I don't know it myself. But why do you ask, Doctor?"

"Well I will tell you. If you were to see a man put his arm round a young lady and kiss her affectionately,—what would you think?—That they were married or at anyrate engaged to be married?"

She gave a slight voluntary exclamation, but did not reply.

I repeated my words and looked straight into her eyes She turned them away, with an uneasy expression on her face.

"The people you saw," she replied presently, "need not be husband and wife, or even lovers. They might be brother and sister."

"Well, yes; so they might be. Have you a brother, Miss Colebrooke?"

"I do not," she said, drawing up her pretty head with dignity "understand why you want to know, or why you should ask me so many questions—especially when——" She stopped.

"Then the gentleman I saw was your brother."

"You will not mention——" she began.

"You don't think," I interrupted, "that I gossip about what I may learn during my visits to patients. You must consider——"

"I did not mean to offend you," she interposed. "I was only going to ask you not to mention that you have seen this man."

"I understand," I said quietly.

"I cannot tell you now," she continued, "who the gentleman is, the sight of whom has naturally roused your curiosity. I may perhaps tell you soon—not that I am bound to do so, but you and Mrs. Stonewall have been so very good and kind, that I should not like you to think unkindly of me."

I went away with a lighter spirit. I felt happier. I had ascertained at least that she had not passed the gates of wedlock.

The next day I learned from her that the mysterious stranger was her father! Before telling me she had made me solemnly promise not to reveal the information to any one. This extreme caution surprised me very much. Why should she object to it being known that he was her father? I jumped to the conclusion that he had done something wrong, or why was this strict concealment necessary?

She perceived in my face the doubts in my mind. I frankly avowed them. I asked her why he was hiding himself from the world.

She was so evidently distressed and troubled at my question, that it made me vexed that I had asked it.

"Do not inquire, Docter. There is a sad reason for it. I will speak to him. He may like to see you, now you have found out his being in the house."

"I should like to know him. Will you introduce me?"

She paused a moment, pondering. "Well I will tell him," she said, "so that you promise not to reveal to a single soul his presence in this place."

"You have my word for it. It is a word that has never been broken."

Next time I called, she told me that her father had consented to see me, then led the way to his room.

"Papa," she said, as she opened the door "this is Dr. Aylmer, who has been so kind to me, and to poor Thompson. I have brought him to see you."

He was sitting at a desk with his head bent over some writing. As soon as he saw me he rose and bowed. He was a tall, well-formed man, and gentleman-like in appearance. He had strongly marked features, with eager eyes, capable, I thought, of flashing with fiery passion, when he was vexed. His manner with me was cold and suspicious, at first. He watched me attentively, but after a few minutes he became more at ease. I soon saw he had something on his mind. He did not attend to my remarks, for he continually begged my pardon, and asked me to repeat what I had been saying. He looked unhappy and wretched, except when his daughter spoke to him, and then what a change came across his face! He smiled brightly and seemed for a moment to forget his troubles.

"I see Ida very seldom now," he said; "her time is so fully taken up with Mrs. Thompson. I feel very dull when she leaves me. It is a lonely life—shut up here. I don't like it, and yet——"

"But why stay up here, then?" I asked. "There are many families in Spanners in whose society you would find pleasure."

"It cannot be, Dr. Aylmer. You do not know my unhappy circumstances."

"That is true."

"Well then, these circumstances compel me to keep myself away from my fellow-creatures."

"I am sorry to hear you say so," I remarked.

"Well, at anyrate I have reason enough in all conscience to be sorry for myself." He spoke so strangely that I began to fear that his brain was affected. "Do you know?" he continued "but for her!" pointing to his daughter—"I would wish I were dead—rather, that I had never been born."

"Oh, dear papa," remonstrated Ida gently.

"Unhappiness makes you despond," I remarked.

"Yes, sir; and misery caused by—by"——

"I had rather not hear it," I said, "if it pains you to tell me."

"It would shock you, Docter. You and your Aunt have been very kind to my child, and I feel I can safely confide in you; but I will not burden you with a secret, that you might not think right to conceal, and which would endanger me if it were published."

His words made me wonder whether his brain was affected by some strange mania, or whether, as I had thought at first, he had committed a crime that was imperilling his liberty. Whatever the dread mystery was, I knew it was a frightful load on his conscience, and that the knowledge of it was saddening the life of his innocent young daughter. Even now as he spoke, the tears rose involuntarily to her eyes. He noticed this.

"Ida, dear child, come to me," he said tenderly. "Kiss me, my darling. You are unhappy. Oh, how cruel I am! If I were dead, you would get over my loss, after a time, and be cheerful again, and lead a brighter and a freer life. Shall I die? Say the word."

"Papa, dear, what are you saying?" she cried in a distressed voice.

Poor man, I thought, he must surely be insane. I rose to take my leave.

"When shall I have the pleasure of seeing you again favour me?" I am so dull, never seeing any one."

I willingly promised, and left the room feeling wretched at the thought that Ida's father was the victim of some dread form of monomania.

The Indians Disappearing.

The Rev. Dr. Barrows has recently published his views on the Indian question as derived from a thorough investigation made in the West in the summer of '85. This investigation goes to prove that the Indians, instead of increasing in numbers, as lately reported by the United States Indian Commissioners, are "wasting and disappearing." In 1820, it was estimated by a government official that there were 425,766 Indians within the boundaries of the United States, and to this amount must be added the number of Indians in the territory since annexed. According to the census taken just then, the sum-total of all the Indians within the present boundaries of the United States at that time was 526 592. The last census puts them at 255 938, Alaska not included. The decrease, then, would seem to be 260,554. These figures, especially the original estimate, are extremely uncertain. Dr. Barrows proves that among the civilized and semi-civilized Indians, the falling off is 2,000 per annum for the last eighteen years. Allowing these figures to be true, the increase, if indeed there be such, of the savage Indians, who number only 50,000, could not balance the loss among the other 200,000. He therefore concludes the Indians are wasting away. This result may have been inevitable; but one cannot but think that with our present civilization, the showing should have been better. "I tremble for my country," said Thomas Jefferson, "when I remember that God is just."

LATE DOMINION NEWS.

One hundred Scotch operatives have just been imported by the St. Croix Cotton Company to work in their mills at St. Stephen, N. B.

It is reported that Mrs. Lewis Stillwell, and Ransom Forbes, who stood their trial together for the murder of Lewis Stillwell, have been married.

The dead body found in a hay mow at Cepetown turns out to be Arthur Todd, a Hamilton man, who was formerly employed in the Grand Trunk Railway shops in that city.

A little child named McMullen, aged 1 year and 7 months, while sitting on the rails of the Grand Trunk city branch, at Belleville, was struck by an engine and cut in two.

A young man named Spiers, of Tobermory, had loaded a shot gun with an ounce ball to shoot bear, and while he stood with his arm resting on the muzzle the gun discharged, shattering the limb so that amputation will be necessary.

A visitor to the machinery hall at the Toronto Exhibition the other evening had a narrow escape. His rubber coat caught in the shafting and held him pinned until the garment was cut from his back. A few abrasions was the only injury he received.

A cat belonging to Mr. Wm. Berbridge, of St. Thomas, was stung to death by hornets a few day ago. A number of boys disturbed a nest of hornets in the barn, and the insects settled down upon the cat in scores, covering his entire body and stinging him to death.

Misses Lizze and Jennie Lumsden were driving from Arnprior to Sand Point with a young man named Wm. Ashby, when the horse took fright at a passing train. Miss Lumsden, in attempting to jump from the buggy, received such injuries as to cause her death in a few hours.

Early last Sunday morning the vault in the office of the Toronto Street Railway Company was burglarized. The burglars dug a hole through from the adjoining building, by means of which they gained access to the company's vault. They stole $600 in silver and made good their escape.

In a frolic at Orangedale, Cape Breton, two young men named McLennan and McDonald got into a quarrel. A fight ensued, during which knives were drawn and McLennan was stabbed to death. McDonald was arraigned at Port Hood and committed for trial in the Supreme Court.

Frederick Madill, of Lakefield, 15 years of age, working at Hazlitt's mill, Peterboro, went for a swim in the river above the mill with a dozen other boys. Madill jumped off the boom into four or five feet of water and never rose to the surface. The boys gave the alarm, and the body was recovered in an hour.

A sailor named Jas. Glass, of Cornwall, Ont., about 18 years of age, shipped on board the barge Menekaune the other day for Oscoda, Mich., thence for Chicago, and when off Giant Point, about 3 a.m., he fell overboard and was drowned. Every effort was made to recover the body, but so far unsuccessfully.

The first frost occured in Winnipeg a few nights ago, but too late to cause any loss. Harvesting is all over, and threshing is going on all over the Province. The previous estimate of the crop is more than correct. Wheat will be a good two-thirds crop, and oats and barley about the same; new wheat is selling at 55c. and 60c.; oats, 30.; barley, 50c.

A white girl employed in a Kingston hotel has fallen in love with a colored barber and is determined to marry him whether he will or not. He, it seems, manifested symptoms of a desire to escape the engagement, and on Saturday he received a legal communication intimating that he must marry or be sued for $500 for breach of promise. He will marry.

Two raftsmen left Britannia, about seven miles up the river from Ottawa the other afternoon, to come down to Hull on a crib of timber. When about a mile above Chaudiere Falls their crib became unmanageable, and they gave themselves up for lost. The crib ran aground, however, on one of the rocky ledges above the Falls, and there the two men spent the night in constant terror lest they should be floated off and swept over the Falls. The next morning their perilous position was observed, when two other raftsmen, named Geo. Kempt and Jas. Kennedy, courageously went to the rescue in a small boat. The two men were taken off the ledge in an exhausted condition and brought safely ashore.

The other afternoon a Canadian Pacific Railway train was running up to the gravel pit two and a-half miles east of Peterborough. As the pit was approached the brakes were put on to slacken speed. Dennis McCarthy, one of the brakemen, placed himself at his wheel, and in order to get a greater purchase, applied himself to turning it with a stick. As he was forcing the wheel round the stick gave way and he fell from the cars. He went head foremost, striking against a steep bank, made by a small cut. As his head struck the bank his feet went backwards to the track. He was so stunned by the shock that he did not drag his feet away. Thirteen cars passed over them. The train was stopped, the man was lifted on board, and taken to Peterborough. As the left foot was hanging by shreds of the muscles and pieces of the integuments it was decided to amputate and dress that part of the injury first. He was placed under the influence of chloroform and the operation was commenced. But before it was near over the patient died.

A Liberal Offer.

A Chicago woman advertised for a lady's maid.

"How much do you pay a month?" asked one of the applicants for the position.

"Ten dollars."

"That's not enough."

"Yes, but whenever I get married I always give my maid two dollars. You should take that into consideration."

"I accept the position. Why, that will amount to more than the wages. That's the most liberal offer I've ever had."

A correspondent asks: "Would you or any of your many readers inform a constant reader how to learn to play the flute?' Not if we know ourselves.

A CITY editor, speaking of a fat rural contemporary, said; "If all flesh is grass, then he must be a load of hay." "I expect I am," said the obese farmer-editor, "from the way the asses are nibbling at me."

GOOD VALUE.—Many suffers buying medicine have been disappointed, don't give up, buy a reliable article like Dr. Chase's Liver Cure, and with it you get a receipe book alone worth the money.

How to get along well—Dig it as deep as possible.

A WORD OF EXPLANATION.—The liver secretes bile to move the bowels; the kidneys secrete urine to carry off uric, which would poison the blood; the stomach secretes gastric juice to digest or dissolve the food, ect. Burdock Blood Bitters acts upon these oragns and purifies the blood by cleansing all the secrets of the system.

"My dear," said a sentimental wife, "home, you know, is the dearest spot on earth." "Well, yes," said the practical husband, "it does cost about twice as much as any other spot."

IN SEASON.—It is now in season to warn our readers against the sudden attack Cholera Cramp, Colic, and the various Bowel Complaints incident to the season of ripe fruit, vegetables, etc. Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry is the grand specific for those troubles.

After all, the earthquake, while it did a pile of harm, managed to do a little good. At Columbia, S. C., a man who had been obliged to use crutches for years on account of rheumatism got up when he felt the shock, dropped his crutches, and lit out like a whitehead. He hasn't been obliged to use crutches since, and is thinking seriously of bottling up some of the earthquake, getting it patented and selling it to the masses as a sure cure for rheumatism.

HONESTY THE BEST POLICY.—An honest medicine is the noblest work of man, and we can assure our readers that Dr. Fowlers Extract of Wild Strawberry is not only reliable, but it is almost infallible to cure Cholera Morbus, Dysentery, Canker of the Stomach and bowels, and the various Summer Complaint, whose attacks are often sudden and fatal.

CLIPPINGS.

Newspapers.

To write for a paper is one thing; to edit is another. There are some excellent writers who "make a fool of a paper," if they had the conducting of it for a few weeks. A good editor seldom writes much for his paper; he reads, judges, selects, dictates, alters, combines and to do all this well he has little time to compose. Those people who have most to say about the way a newspaper should be conducted are those who know the least of what they are talking.—[Pioneer Press.

Hog shippments from the Northwest are becoming daily occurrence. Meinther Von-piggie-de-hoggie-de-porky-de-sausage is constantly making a big noise in our little world on the shores of Lake Superior, and like the tramp, he don't disdain taking up quarters for the nigh in the old Neebing hotel stables.—[Fort William Echo.

Mr. Jas. Noble, of the Royal, with his racing stock carried away $235 from the Industrial exhibition, Toronto, last week. That is a good record, and Jim feels highly elated in consequence.—[Meaford Mirror.

Glenelg Picnic.—The picnic held last Thursday in McMillian's Grove Glenelg was a pronounced success. Rev Father Feeney excelled himself as a general host and made every one feel "at home." The repast was a most sumptuous one, and the music by McDonald the Highland piper was particularly excellent. An exciting contest took place, between two lady nominees, for a gold chain and locket, which were won by Miss Mary McMillan. The proceeds would have been greater had not a drenching rain decended just before the allotted time expired. No one gives a hartier welcome to visitors than the Glenelg Highlandmen and next year, if their annual picnic is held earlier in the season, large numbers will attend it. Markdale especially was well represented.—[Durham Chronicle.

A young daughter of Mrs. Anderson of this village, aged about 13 got dangerously burned a few days ago. She sat down on the damper of the stove, fell asleep, and was awakened by her dress being on fire. She attempted to brush it out with her arm, which had only the effect of setting her sleeve on fire. She then got frightened and ran out, when an elder sister ran after her, but before they could get out the flames the young girls back and one arm was terribly burned, while the sisters hands were badly blistered in trying to put the flame out. Dr. McCullough has been attending the sufferer since and considers the case a serious one.—[Chatsworth cor. in O. S. Advertiser.

Sheep Worried.—Mr. Thos. Scar, of G. R. Glenelg, had six sheep worried by dogs on Monday night last, five killed outright. The sheep killed were the pick of the flock, as they were the fattest and easiest caught. The dogs is known and the owner we understand will be requested to settle the damages.—[Grey Review.

Of Vital Importance.—it is just as essental that the human body should have pure blood, as that a tree or plant should have sap to nourish and invigorate its growth. Nearly all our bodily illa rises from unhealthy blood. Burdock Blood Bitters purifies this fountain in life, and regulates all the vital organs to a healthy action.

THE FARM.

It Makes a Man of Him.

It is not the worst thing that might happen to a boy to be born on a stony farm. It was the rocks and the stumps that were in the way, and which had to be cleared out to make smooth land fit for cultivation that developed the energy and persistence that have made some of our great men what they are. A boy that can undertake the job of picking small stones from a four-acre field and carry it through without complaining, has acquired a training that will carry him through almost any difficulty he may be called upon to overcome in after life. The men who project tunnels through mountains and under rivers, who dig canals and build railroads across continents, are not men who when boys had everything done for them, but they are men who when boys had to do for themselves or go without, who had to hoe their own row, cut their own swath, and take their fair share of the disagreeable work that somebody must do in this busy world.

Stunted Animals Never Recover.

Very rarely is an animal worth raising that is stunted during the growing period of its life. The profits on raising stock are too small to allow of keeping and feeding young animals that have for any length of time stopped growing. A mature animal may get thin in cold weather or on short feed and then fatten up again when the conditions are made favorable to a gain, but a month or a week of lost time in the life of a growing animal can never be regained. If the growing period is past without making the growth that is natural to the individual that individual, whether it be a calf, a colt, a pig, chicken, or a child must remain under size through life. Recently while traveling we met a boy from Nova Scotia, said to be 16 years old, that was but twenty-four inches high, and weighed but eight pounds. Such dwarfs as these may enjoy a fair degree of health, but by no system of feeding can they be grown to the natural standard of the species. The bones, though small, are matured bones, and cannot be made to enlarge.

The majority of farmers seem not to be aware of the fact, or to heed it if they knew it. The fundamental rule of growing stock may be expressed in these terms: Feed a sufficiency and of the proper kind of food to keep the animals always growing as rapidly as possible. As long as the relative prices of feed and meat make stock growing profitable at all it will pay to feed after this rule.

Timely Suggestions.

An old farmer says he never knew "a whistling laborer" who gave any trouble about his food, lodging, or any little extra work. Such men are generally kind and genial to children and to animals of all degrees; they come around him without fear. Generally such men have clear consciences, clean tongues and morals, and are safer among young people than the majority of strolling hands are, whose presence among them, when not guarded, is pollution and perdition.

Heaves is a specific disorder arising from indigestion as one principal cause. Musty hay and grain is one of the predisposing causes. Among the more prominent symptoms is a grunting cough, more or less emaciation, a staring coat, and a general disability for work. The treatment is to feed nothing but the most digestible food, and with as little hay as will properly distend the stomach. Give but little water at a time, but as often as necessary, and never immediately after eating. Do not drive the horse hard, and never within an hour after eating. Grass, any fruits the horse will eat, scalded sound oats, and bran mashes will be indicated. If the bowels are constipated give the following: Five drams Barbacoes aloes and 1 dram each of gentian and ginger; make into a ball with soap or sirup and give. As a tonic to be given in soft feed the following will be good: One-half ounce sulphate of iron, 1 ounce nitrate of potash, 2 drams fenugreek seed, 2 ounces linseed meal; powder, mix, and give a teaspoonful morning and night.

Let the horse cool slowly and then groom him quite dry, first with a wisp of straw, then with a brush. This removes dust, dirt, and sweat, and allows time for the stomach to recover itself and the appetite to return. Also let his legs be well rubbed by the hand. Nothing so soon removes a strain. It also detects thorns or splinters, soothes the animals, and enables him to feel comfortable.

Success in the dairy depends entirely upon the dairyman. A good dairyman, first of all, will see that he has the necessary appliances to insure success—good cows, suitable feed and buildings, and the proper utensils and knowledge for turning out a first class product. In fact, the intelligent and enterprising dairyman would be satisfied with nothing else.

I have a farm well tiled that was wet before tiling; now it is a fine tame-grass land. About three to three and a half rods each side of the tiling the clover has grown a good second crop, while the land on the outside, mowed the same day, has hardly started at all. My neighbor has a cornfield which shows the same thing. No water has run through the tiling since about June 25.

Niagara Suspension Bridge.

It having been found that the stone of the four towers of the Niagara Railroad suspension bridge is slowly disintegrating, it has been decided to replace them by iron supports. Although the work is a difficult and dangerous undertaking, it is being carried on without interfering much with the traffic over the bridge. Every precaution, however, has been taken to prevent accidents. The workmen are now engaged in removing some of the stones from the sides of the towers, to make room for the preliminary iron work. The upper caps are being drilled, so that, when the time comes, hydraulic jacks may be readily slipped into place, and the great cable transferred from the stone supports to the strong iron towers which are to replace them. The towers are being manufactured in Detroit, and will shortly be shipped to Niagara. Their cost will be $40,000.

Count Tolstoi told an American who recently visited him in Russia that his novels are the least important work of his life, and can be understood only by his religious books. The distinguished author was ploughing a field belonging to a peasant widow, and was dressed in a Russian peasant's shirt and drawers, his object being to put in practice the fundamental principles of Christianity as these were expounded by Christ. For this purpose he had abandoned his magnificent estate, and was laboring with his own hands for those who needed help.

With his detective camera under his arm, so disposed as to suggest a grip-sack, and thus to disarm suspicion, Mr. W. Hamilton Gibson caught on the fly hundreds of characteristic attitudes, costumes, and facial expressions during his recent trip South. Among his instantaneous photographs are several that illustrate the process of felling the huge cypresses of the Louisiana swamps, views of the cypress receiving its first blow from the "swamper's" axe, or just beginning to swerve from the perpendicular, or falling with a great splash into the water, or abandened by the "swamper" in his flight from danger. Some of the old slaves of the wharves of New Orleans—men and women—are extremely picturesque as Mr. Gibson took them, and he knows how to use his material in the production of artistic pictures. No pen or pencil sketches could have preserved a hundredth part of Mr. Gibson's photographic collection of vital facts.

A Model Sermon.

George Francis Train, the most gifted crank in America, used to deliver a burlesque sermon from the text "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" The style was something as follows:

Firstly, my friends, why? why? wherefore? for what purpose? give a reason! Explain! Why? Why?

Secondly, Why stand? Why stand Why not sit down? Why not lie down? Why not walk? Wherefore do ye not run? Why stand? Why stand?

Thirdly, Why stand YE? Why don't somebody else stand? Why don't your wife stand? Why don't your father stand? Why don't your mother stand? Why don't your brethern, or your sisters, or your uncles or your aunts stand? Why don't your grandfather stand? My friends, why stand YE? Why stand YE?

Fourthly, Why stand ye HERE? Why don't you stand elsewhere? Why stand in this particular place? Why not stand in the street, in the fields, in the busy marts of commerce, in the gilded palaces of sin? Why stand ye HERE?

Fifthly, Why stand ye here all the DAY? Why don't ye stand in the night? Why stand in the light of the noonday sun? Why not stand mantled in the shadow of night! Why stand when all mankind is at labor? Why not stand when all nature is hushed in sweet repose? Why stand ye here all the DAY?

Sixthly. Why stand ye here all the day IDLE? Why don't you go to work? Why waste the precious moments in sluggish inactivity! Be active! Be stirring! Hump yourselves! Loosen your joints and get up and dust! Why stand ye here all the day idle?

A hit in time saves the nine on many a ball field.

Tale of the Two Alexanders.

The antagonism between the prince and the czar is not of modern birth or later growth. It dates far back, from the time when they were both children. They used to meet every year at Darmstadt. The Empress Marie of Russia was in the habit of annually revisiting the city of her birth to spend a few weeks with her brothers, Alexander of Hesse and the former Grand Duke Louis III. They were so much liked by the Czar Alexander II. that, in order to be near them, he had fixed his summer residence at the castle of Jagenheim, and never failed to summon near him the two little Battenberg boys, his nephews.

Prince Alexander was so particularly a favorite of the emperor that the jealous rivalry of his own sons was thereby excited. Thus were laid the seeds of the enmity which has attracted so much attention. One day at Jagenheim the little Battenberg boy, seated on the czar's knee and toying with his orders, asked the name of one particular star. "It is the cross of St. George," answered his uncle, "a cross you will wear on your breast when you are a Russian general and have won your first victory."

At these words of his father's the czarewitch turned away, impatiently muttering so as to be heard: "Of course all the good things must be for Germans now."

"Are you not a German yourself?" asked the dauntless little boy. "German blood flows in your veins, Imperial highness."

The czarewitch never quite forgave or wholly forget the retort of the pampered child whom in his heart he considered as an objectionable poor relation; and there never was then or thereafter much love lost between the cousins.

Anniversary of a Bell.

The busy city of Breslau, in Prussia, found time recently to celebrate the five hundredth birthday of a church bell. A tragic story of the casting of this bell has kept it famous throughout Germany for a longer period than has elapsed since the discovery of America.

The founder of the bell, on the seventeenth of July 1386, when the molten metal was just ready to run into the mould, left the foundry for a few moments in charge of a boy, warning him not to meddle with the apparatus. The boy disobeyed the injunction, and set the metal running. Terrified, he called the founder, who, on seeing the mischief, supposing the bell ruined, struck the boy to the earth and killed him.

When the metal cooled and the bell was tried, it was found to be of admirable tone and finish—the founder's masterpiece. Stricken with remorse, he gave himself up to the magistrate, and was condemned to expiate his crime by death. He walked to the place of execution to the tolling of his own bell, calling upon all the people to pray for "the poor sinner." The bell has ever since borne the name of the Poor Sinner's Bell.

At that early period Breslau was a country village of little note. It has now grown to be the seat of the linen manufacture of Silesia, and next to Berlin, the largest city of Prussia. The anniversary of the founding of the Poor Sinner's Bell was not forgotten, however. The bell was rung morning and evening, and the pastor of the church preached a sermon in honor of the occasion, in which he told once more the well-remembered tale.

Promoting Civilization.

The campaign of the English in Abyssinia, some ten years ago, and the later invasion of the country by forces sent to the relief of Gen. Gordon, have led to some unusual correspondence between the two Governments. Diplomatic notes have been sent, and acknowledged with the usual formalities. To emphasize the more strongly the expressions of mutual respect, many presents have been made on both sides. Some of these courtesies were attended with amusing results, according to a recent English writer:

After the war with Abyssinia, an Englishman asked a chief what gift he would most like in return for some assistance he had rendered, and the Ethiopian at once replied that there was one thing above all others that his heart coveted, and that was—not a rifle, or a telescope, or even a cannon—but the full dress of a British general officer.

MARKDALE, SEPT. 30. 1886,

American papers have the news from Ottawa that American speculators are negotiating with the Canadian Government for the purchase of several Islands in the St. Lawrence between Brockville and Gananoque. They propose starting summer resorts next season.

—From New York comes a curious proposition for the solution of the over-producting problem. Governor Hill proposes to make Saturday a legal holiday and thus reduce the working capacity of all the working classes by onesixth. He would have five days of labor, one day of recreation, and one day of religious observance in every week. This would also effectually solve the Saturday half-holiday question.

—Two North-West Towns, Portage La Prairie and Minnedosa, borrowed so freely during the "boom" that now when things have got down to hard pan, they find themselves in financial straits and have adopted the expedient of dissolving their municipal government and telling their creiditors to collect their claims. This is simply repudiation and it will seriously hurt the credit of all North-West municipalities

—The Statistical Abstract and record just issued by the Dominion Department of Agriculture looks the most practically useful blue book published by the Dominion Government. It is a compilation of useful figures and facts with refrence to the areas, history, Governments, population, produce, finances, commerce and general statistics of Canada. It contains in a handy form information published in greater detail in the other Departmental Reports. Yearly editions are promised.

—At the Methodist Conference a communication from the Anglican Provincial Synod announced the appointment of a committee to confer with similar committees appointed by the religious bodies as to the possibility of a union of the Protestant churches in Canada, was warmly applauded. The idea has also been cordially endorsed from the pulpit by eminent Congregational and Presbyterian ministers. What one of these pronounced to be one of the first essentials to a union, i. e., a strong desire to exist.

It is estimated in Chicago that half of the wheat crop raised east of the Rockies this year has already gone forward, and with the best effect on the trade of this country. The reason assigned for this unusually early movement is that the large number of producers who held on to their grain last year lost money by so doing, and determined not to be caught again. It was a needed lesson. The farmer who holds on for rising price generally burns his fingers, and at the same time checks the natural flow to the volume of trade. He cannot afford to gamble in his own wheat—to bet on higher prices— for the previous exchange gamblers can rake off his pile every time.

EARLY CLOSING.

The end of the term for the early closing of stores has arrived ; and now some of the clerks pertly remark that, "the fall and winter months is the proper time for early closing," giving the following reasons :—That there is but little shopping done during late hours; that it encourages loafing in the stores; that the young people thus kept in until a late hour are deprived of an opportunity of improving their minds, by night schools, reading, &c., and furthermore, that it is a great waste of fuel and light to the proprietors which would not be necessary in the event of keeping open an extra hour in summer time, besides being a great accommodation to farmers and others, who prefer making their purchase in daylight. The above reasons appear quite plausible, and worthy of consideration. What say our merchants?

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents'

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

The annual Fall Exhibition of the East Grey Agricultural Society was held in this village on the 23rd and 24 inst; during both days the weather was all that could be desired and thousands visited our enterprising village. Flags were hoisted at too mast and considerable bunting was displayed; the shops and business places had on their prettiest dress and everything and everybody bright and cheerful. The first day attendance on theExhibition grounds was small;|the new feat ure this year of horse racing the first day, so far as we have heard, did not prove to be a popular movement and if repeated, is likely to prove damaging to the fair. The second day attendance was good the gate receipts equal to that of former years about $200,00. The number of exhibits we thought not as large as on former years; from the exhibits a good idea can be obtained of the capabillities of the country and the value of its products. The exhibit of this year did not do justice in that respect to the East Riding of Grey.

ON THE FIELD:—the live stock exhibits were very good—1st Horses— Some fine animals were shown in the ring. Messrs Trimble & Pickell showed some fine Draught Colts and brood mares (imported) which seemed to attract the attention of many.

2nd. Cattle,—In imported cattle, Durham. Devons and Ayrshires, were exhibited by W. O'Brine, R. Olliver and A. Carns—3rd Sheep —The display was small but very good quality, some very fine Leicesters, Shropshires and Cotswold were exhibited by W. J. Shepherdson, T. Ellis and A. Cairns. 4th. Swine— Some fiue breeds were exhibited, Suffolks by J. Holly and Berkshire by T. Ferguson and Stinson. .5th, Poultry—The display was large and contained some fine specimens of of the different varieties. Impliment and Carriages—The exhibit rather small. J. H. Herd showed some very fine work.

In the Exhibition hall.—One entire side was set apart for ladie's fancy work, paintings, pencil and crayon work &c. The other side for grain, roots sewing machines, harness and other manufactured goods! the Centre was well fitted with Vegetables, Fruit, Flowers, &c A magnificent display of Flowers were show by JamesBeecroft from the Flesherton green house. The north end devoted to dairy products, Butter, Cheese, and honey. As one entered from the south the thing to please the eye was the very large and m gnificent display of gold and silver ware and plated goods, especially that shown by our enterprising Jeweler, J. G. Russell, of this village, of Gold and Silver watches. Rings, Pins,sets and fine Plated goods far surpassed anything ever shown in this place before. W. A. Brown, Esq., Jewler of Markdale had also a fine display of goods in his line some valuable andpretty goods but he, did not secure as good a position as his competior consequently his exhibit did not show to as good advantage. Mrs. Bulmer's very fine collection of. Photo's was proof positive that she waswell up in the Photographic Art.

Fancy Work—Curtains. quilts, shirts, needle and ornamental work in great variety and would compare favorably with much larger and more prententious show The exhibits in worsted embroidery, braiding in Cotton, Arrasine work, Ornamental needle work, and leather ornaments were well worthy of notice. Some choice wax flowers, showed by Mrs. Armstrong, and paintings by Miss Richardson and Miss Damude, all of this village, were very fine and much admired. Mr. Moffat of Markdale has few equals on scroll and ornamental wood work. His display attracted much attention. In Harness, Messrs J. Gordon and D. Clayton each showed some very fine work. In Boots and Shoes W. Barnhouse showed some fine work.

GRAIN.—The speciemens showed were very good in every respect, we did not think the display large. The sample of barley was much better than that of last. J. Brodie and T. Kells were the principal exhibitors in that grain. Some good samples in Fall wheat were shown. In Spring wheat the sample not so good ; Oats were plump and good, equal to anything shown in previous years, and Peas very choice surpassing former years, Vegetables—In Potatoes a great variety shown, fifteen different kinds; the Early Rose seemed to be the favored. J. Fawcett of Euphrasia and James Ferris of Proton carried off the prizes. A few fine Tomatoes were shown, the display was small. Onions, Beets, mangles, Carrots, and Celery were shown in large quantities.

FRUIT—In apples a great variety, some, good large specimens were shown, Crab apples in abundance. The show of pears, was small also that of Grapes, not so goodand the latter rather inferior in quality. Plums in abundsce and quality good.

BREAD—About last but not least, the staff of life. Home made bread, the exhibits were all good. Among the dairy products there was some sweet Roll butter, and some very choice dairy in ferkins ; also some we consider very poor. A limited quality of home-made cheese were shown, some very fair. Now, Mr. Editor, no doubt there was many things unnoticed by your reporter, but you will please pardon his youthand inexperience. At the close of the exhibition on the second day we were not able to be present to hear the oratoin from the grand stand by the president of the Society, Mr. T. Kells, consequently are unable to report the same to you. Notes on fair day—The Brass Band played for the Ladies' Aid Society they looked well and played well : Constable Cooey did his duty well.

It is said the President made a fluent speech, that the Agr. Society moved a vote of thanks for the Band that there was no body seen drunk on fair day, and that W. A. Brown had a big auction sale of Watches and jewelery after the fair.

FATALLY INJURED.—On Thursday evening last, Mr. W. Radley of Osprey, while at Flesherton Station for a load of coal, in the act of assisting to shunt some cars, was caught between the cupling, injuring his spine and inflicting other terrible injuries. The unfortunate man was at once crried to A. Hannah's Hotel, Dr. Carter of this place was immediately summoned, but the sufferer's injuries were beyond medical remedy! he passed away in about three hours. He remained conscious until the last. He leaves a wife and one child to mourn his loss. Being a member of the Volunteer force, his remains were laid away with Military honors on Saturday afternoon last

During the days of the fair the Ladies' Aid Society of the Presbyterian church here served dinner and held a Bazaar in the Town Hall ; the dinner was good and well served. In the Bazaar the articles for sale were numerous, of various kinds and colors ; some very pretty things indeed. The Ladies' received a very liberal patronage. They well deserved it, for they engaged the services of our Brass Band for the entertainment of the public. Some very nice music was discoursed during the day. A grand concert, under the auspices of the above Society was given in the Town Hall on the evening of the 24, when a good programme, consisting of vocal and instrumental music was gone through. Mr. Richardson, Esq., occupied the chair.

Owng to the illness of the Rev. Mr. Ayers the pulpit in the Methodist church was filled last Sabbath morning by J. P. Nicholson, and in the evening by the Rev. Mr. Hosking of Markdale ; as the hour for service passed and Mr. Hosking had not arrived Rev. Mr. Ayers being able to be present bearing upon his staff and the desk commenced the service and had got fairly into, his Sermon when Rev. Mr. Hosking came, Mr. Ayers stopped and said "Now, that is short metre, I'll give you the balance some other time." The Rev. Mr. Hosking entered upon his subject at once and delivered a very interesting sermon.

A very pleasant evening's entertainment and concert was held under the auspices of W. C. T. W. of this place in the Temperance Hall on Monday evening. The evening was very wet consequently there was not a very large turn out. Refreshments were served by the ladies' and a short and spicy program gone through ; Dr. Christoe in the chair. At the close of the entertainment Mrs. J. E. Moore, in a few well chosen words, presented A. R. Fawcett, Editor, with the badge of an honorary member in their Society, thanking him for the use of the columns of his paper in assisting them to push forward their good work.

The grain market is again booming in our town. Richardson & Co. are again on the market and Mr. Hogg and others are reported coming, so we notice there will be keen competition in that line here.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—Who has more people to please, or more masters than the Public school master? Evidently no one. The minister of the Gospel I think ranks next. They claim to have more, but the point is disputed, so let it remain for the present, that is not what I'm going to argue now. The teacher is beset one day by a parent who says "my boy is severely dealt with at school, he is a nervous boy, we have to humor at home, and I would like you to be lenient with him." Another says "How is it you show partiality in school, you threshed my boy yesterday and Jones' boy was just as much to blame as he was." Jones is the man who owns the nervious boy. Again another says, "you dont thresh my boy enough, whenever he does what is wrong thresh him, and I'll thresh him when I get him home." However this class of parent is lamentably too small.

Now, a boy gets into mischief and in consequence gets "threshed," but it happens to be Jones' boy, by mistake as an ordinary teacher cannot keep in mind the advice of fifty or sixty parents. Jones comes down to the teacher (who is secure in the belief that he chastized the child of parent No. 2) demanding fifteen minutes of his time on the kings highway and he will "larn" him how to teach a child. Still another says "My boy Tommy was not promoted at the last examination, how was that? And when that unlucky teacher intimates in a kindly way that Tommy has not paid enough attention to his books or that Tommy's head is too thick for an idea to enter, that parent flies off at a tangent, and declares that his boy knows more than the teacher, and wants to fight. The naturally quiet or undecided teacher thinks he has mistaken his calling and ought to be a preacher or corpse or probably a parent. A teacher who is any judge of human nature will in, say six months or a year become acquainted with the dispositions of the various pupils under his charge. But by this time he sees the school trustees have advertised for another teacher, and when he is getting along very well with the pupils, takes this hint that he has to leave, and so on in his next school, and so on to the end of the chapter, who wont condescend to drop a tear over the much tried and sorely afflicted yet innocent and hardworking race.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

Coloring Baskets.

To give a black color to the willow used for baskets and other woven ware the following process has been recommended: Let the material remain from twelve to twenty-four hours in lukewarm water, and then dip it a sufficient length of time in a dye composed of five parts of ground fustic, three of sulphate of copper, five of sulphate of iron, and four of cream of tartar. The dye should be kept at a boiling heat for half an hour, to extract the color from the fustic and dissolve the other ingredients, after which it may be allowed to cool. A small quantity of logwood added will sometimes improve the color. The same process may be used for coloring various fabrics of which summer hats are made, such as straw, palm-leaf, grass, etc.

Household Hints.

Where a filter is unattainable, a very little alum will purify foul water. An ounce of alum will purify a whole hogshead of foul water.

Chloride of lime is an infallible preventive for rats, as they flee from its odor as from a pestilence. It should be thrown down their holes, and spread about wherever they are likely to come, and should be renewed once a fortnight.

To extinguish kerosene flames, if no cloth is at hand, throw flour on the flames. Flour rapidly absorbs the fluid and deadens the flame.

Tin canned goods, when opened, should be immediately transferred to glass or earthenware receptacles. Recent investigations show that cases of poisoning from eating canned goods have arisen from the acid of the canned food attacking the solder of the tins, and sometimes from decomposition accelerated by an electrical action between the solder and the iron of the tin. Never leave canned fruits, meats, or fish in opened tin cans.

At this season of the year napkins, tablecloths and often handkerchiefs and children's clothing are liable to be stained with fruit. It is a good plan to keep a bottle of Javelle water handy and wet the stained articles with this before they are put into the wash. If this is done the stains will be completely removed. If you cannot get the Javelle water, the next best thing is a solution of chloride of lime put into one quart of water; shake it thoroughly, and allowing it to settle, pour off the clear fluid and bottle for use. This is used the same as Javelle water, except that the articles to which this solution has been applied must be thoroughly rinsed in clear water before being put into suds.

Choice Recipes.

TOMATO CHOWDER.—One-half a bushel of green tomatoes, one dozen onions (or leave them out if preferred), one dozen green peppers, all chopped fine. Sprinkle one pint of salt over this and let stand all night, drain off the brine, cover with good vinegar, and cook one hour, then drain and pack in a jar. Take two pounds brown sugar, two tablespoonfuls of cinnamon, one of allspice, one of cloves, one of pepper, half cup of ground mustard, one pint grated horse radish. Vinegar to mix. Boil this and pour over the contents of the jar.

CREAM PIE.—Line a pan with paste and pour in the following mixture and bake: One cup of sugar, three tablespoonfuls of flour, one cup of cream. Stir well before putting into the paste.

SPICE CAKE.—Two cups of flour, one cup of milk, one and one-half cups of brown sugar, one-half cup of butter, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one teaspoonful of cloves, cinnamon, and allspice, and the yolks of two eggs. If not stiff enough, add a little more flour.

LIGHT CAKE.—Take the whites of two eggs, one and one-half cups of white sugar, one cup of milk, one-half cup of butter, two cups of flour, and two teaspoonfuls of baking power. After flavor with lemon or add currants (about a cup), or use raisins, candied peel, or a few caraway seeds.

FOR CURING HAMS.—The following mixture has been used by our family (the countried ones) for about three generations. The hams are sure to keep and are noted for their excellent flavor. For 100 pounds of meat take four pounds of fine salt, four ounces of saltpeter, and one pound of brown sugar. Rub the ham with the mixture every other day, until all is absorbed. No more salt is required.

FRIED APPLES.—Wipe a few nice, smooth-skinned apples, have ready a spider with a little butter and lard in it, let it get hot, and slice the apples into it, sprinkle a little sugar over them, and fry slow to a nice brown, taking great care not to let burn.

SPLENDID COTTAGE PUDDING.—One cup of white sugar, one egg, butter the size of an egg, one cup of milk, two cups of sifted flour, and two tablespoonfuls of baking powder. Sauce—One tablespoonful of flour, one fourth cup of sugar, make into a smooth paste with milk, and pour on hot water till thick enough, and let it come to a boil, stirring constantly. Flavor to taste. Vanilla is the nicest.

The Health Seekers.

Two physicians happened to meet on the streets of Toronto.

"How do you do; busy?"

"I should say so. I am on the go all day and all night. I am almost worn out."

"The same with me. I'll be busy for the next two months attending to people who have returned from their health-getting trips."

"So will I. When people are out of town at the health resorts we have a quiet time, but as soon as they get back they are sure to send for us. I've got more general debility on hand than I have any use for."

A Cordial Invitation.

Scene, front door. Time, 12 o'clock Sunday night.

She: Say, George, when are you coming again?

He: Oh, I'll be here Monday night.

She: Say, George, can't you come before Monday?

"The Uttermost Parts."

There is little of the earth's surface that explorers, adventurers, or traders have not visited, and, for that very reason, no doubt, people are much interested in finding out what may be known about the few remaining unexplored portions. To say nothing about the Polar regions, about which there is, we may suppose, little that is interesting except that they are inaccessible; nor about Thibet, whose people will not permit foreigners to visit them; there are still a few countries about which we are just beginning to know through the visits of observant scientific explorers, whose stories are certainly very interesting.

There is New Guinea, for instance, a great island north-east of Australia, which, though many ships have passed by its shores, has long been marked "unexplored" on the maps. It is now not only pretty well explored, but is being colonized by Europeans. Dr. Miklouche Maclay, a Russian man of science, will soon leave Russia with a party of two hundred and fifty emigrants to start a settlement at Astrolabe Bay.

How strange that Russia, with her immense domain in Asia, should set about establishing a colony in Polynesia! When Dr. Maclay decided to explore north-east New Guinea, seven years ago, he had himself put on shore in the dark at Astrolabe Bay, and was left alone. There the natives found him in the morning, sitting on his portmanteau on the beach.

They did not know that there were any white men in the world, and they thought he had descended from the sky. He encouraged them in that belief; but they set about making experiments to find out whether he was of divine origin, which nearly killed him. They shot arrows at him; if he was a god, they said, these could not hurt him. Two of the arrows wounded him severely. They tied him to a tree and pressed their spears against his teeth till they made him open his mouth. They starved him, believing a god needed no food.

They finally decided that he came from the moon, and treated him well, because whether he was a god or not, he did them much service with his medicine. Dr. Maclay remained there two years. Other Europeans have followed him, and declare the coast to be one of the most beautiful regions in the world.

The Western Soudan, in Africa, is another great and populous region which is just opening to the knowledge of the world. It is for the most part a rather level country, fertile, with scattered hills like our Western buttes. The black Malinka and Bambarra races, pagans, possessed this region until El Hadj Omar, whose sons now rule over the greater part of the western Soudan, and who belong to the Foulah race, also black, but Mohammedans, came, wielding the sword of Islam.

The Foulahs spread destruction over the country; and El Hadj Omar set up a great Mussulman empire. He did some good, for he planted trees over a wide extent of country, so that many towns have woods and thickets around them where no vegetation existed before.

But the Foulahs have fallen into disunion and strife since El Hadj Omar died. One branch of them, the Toucouleurs, have mingled with the pagan population to such an extent that the French, who are trying to get possession of the country, hope to make use of them to overcome the fierce and warlike Foulah sultans.

The Great Shan States, in the interior of Farther India, east of Burmah and west of Anam and south of China, have until lately been almost as much an unknown region as Thibet. They have, altogether, an estimated population of thirty million, although the independent Shan States have but three million. The rest of the country belongs to the surrounding kingdoms.

The city of Zimme, or Tscherg mai, the capital of the portion of the Shan country that belongs to Siam, has itself a population seven hundred thousand. It is rather difficult, however, to make quite sure what the population of these towns really is, as a Chinese census official once found out.

He was sent to enumerate the people of Wu-ming-hsien, somewhere in this region. He deputed the work to two assistants, who returned such widely different figures that he discharged them after punishing them severely. He then sent two more officials, who got together and agreed to return the same number, twenty thousand four hundred and one.

The census official shut them up separately, asked each whether the odd one was a male or a female, and, receiving conflicting replies, reported both men for punishment. He then tried to take the census himself, but the people fled to the woods, and he hanged himself in despair. On his person was found the following:

CENSUS OF THE CITY OF WU-MING HSIEN.

In the Province of Mei yu-fu.

Men—none.
Women—none.
Children under 14, of both sexes—none.
Grand total—none.

The best tea of China comes from Southern Yun-nan, which is mostly inhabited by Shan people, and from the Shan States themselves. The English traveller, Mr. Colquhoun, says that the Shans are peaceable, industrious, civilized and lettered, and seem to be by nature a race of peddlers. There is an English scheme for a railway from Burmah into the Shan States.

The Clerk Could Go To Bed.

A countryman and his son "put up" at a hotel during the Toronto fair. Son out seeing the town. Old gent comes down from his room at midnight and says to the night clerk—

"Has my son come in yet?"

Night Clerk—"Guess not. Haven't seen him."

Old Gent—"Well, you needn't set up for him any longer."

A Brooklyn lady at Greenwood Lake put her baby on a bed to sleep, and, fearing that it might roll off, placed an open trunk half full of clothing by the bedside that the child might fall into it if it fell from the bed. The child did fall from the bed, and did fall into the trunk, but when the mother found it it was dead. It had tangled its head in the clothing and smothered.

HEALTH.

Horrible Hay Fever.

It is an outgrowth of modern civilization, and occurs only in persons who possess a certain special susceptibility of the nervous system, either hereditary or acquired. It is more common in men than women, and prevails among men of letters and intellectual culture. The direct exciting cause is now well ascertained to be pollen of certain plants, such as the grasses, rye, wheat, oats, ragweed and Roman wormwood. The pollen of different plants excites it in different persons, but whatever cause produces it once will produce it again in the same person. Hence it appears oftentimes with strict regularity year after year, at seasons varying from May to October. The first symptoms are those of itching of the eyelids and nasal passages, followed by frequent sneezing and the discharge of a serous fluid. Henry Ward Beecher, himself a sufferer, says: "You never before even suspected what it really was to sneeze. If a pane of glass is gone you sneeze. If you look into the sunshine you sneeze. If you sneeze once you sneeze twenty times. It is a riot of sneezes. First, a single one, like a leader in a flock of sheep, bolts over; and then, in spite of all you can do, the whole flock dashing over in twos, in fives, in bunches of twenty." Next, there is redness and watering of the eyes, swelling of the mucous membrane, of the nose and general febrile symptoms. Sometimes the nose is entirely closed by the swelling. Cough follows, more or less frequent and violent, generally with but little expectoration. In a certain proportion of cases there are paroxisms of asthma, more or less severe. After a variable duration the sneezing ceases, the discharge becomes thick and less abundant, the swelling subsides and all the symptoms abate. The only method of preventing the disease in susceptible persons is to avoid exposure to the exciting cause. Certain localities have gained wide notoriety from the immunity which they afford from this disease Bethlehem, N. H., is one of the most famous of these. Others are found among the mountains, at the seaside and on islands. A voyage at sea always gives relief.

Apples for the Sick.

Dr. Whitman, of Beaufort, S. C., says: "I find good, ripe, fresh apples one of the very best articles of diet where the patient wants a little something to eat, and only a little. I presume there is more at fault in the manner of giving them than in the article itself, where faulty digestion results. If the attendant will pare the apple, and then scrape it with a spoon or common case knife, and give the soft pulp of a fresh apple, it will hurt no one. To the contrary the stomach will frequently retain it, and the patient enjoy it, when nothing else can be taken. I have used the pulp of ripe apples for a relish in fevers, when nothing else would seem to satisfy the patient's craving, and would not like to have to discard it, on the score of indigestibility. Great chunks of half ripe apples are good for no one, but the scraped pulp of a good apple will harm no one."

Good Disinfectants.

This is the season of the year when disinfectants are of the greatest service, and should be regularly employed in every house where there is an occasion for their use. Everything which can properly be so disposed of should be burned. Potato parings, remnants of food from the table, and all sorts of garbage can be usually more easily disposed of in this way than any other. Substances which cannot be gotten rid of in this way such as house slops, etc., may be disinfected by means of copperas, or sulphate of iron. It is well to have a solution of disinfectant always on hand. Dissolve two pounds of copperas in a gallon of hot water. Keep in a wooden or earthen vessel. A quart of this solution will thoroughly disinfect several gallons of decomposing matter in fluid form.

Hints on Feasting.

It is brutal to drench an oyster with vinegar or pepper sauce.

Praise your housekeeper for her successful dishes, and regard leniently her failures.

Never accept the invitation of a man to take "pot luck" with him. He degrades the name of dinner, and also, insults you.

Nature is a great physician. Don't be afraid to trust her; she looks carefully after the interests of her patients' stomachs.

Let an invalid have whatever he calls for to eat; it is not he who craves it, but Nature, and she will not permit him to eat to excess.

A few spoonfuls of soup, possessing body, taken on an empty stomach, gives it tone and prepares it to receive acceptably more substantial fare.

In the progress of civilization the frying-pan disappeared with the advent of the gridiron; which in turn has been superceded by the wire-boiler.

A drop or two of lemon-juice and a dash of cayenne on an oyster may be tolerated, but it is best eaten directly from the shell flavored with its own juice.

A dyspeptic has no right to dine among civilized beings. He should take a sea voyage, or go into the wilderness and live for a while, like John the Baptist, on locusts and wild honey.

Tippu Tib is only 45 years old, as coal, and of negroid blood, which that he comes of an admixture of tribes of east Africa and has little Arab blood in his veins. in central Africa for twenty-five is to-day the greatest slave and in the world. He has outstripped competitors through sheer force and strength of character. As the time when Cameron introduced our notice he visited Nyangwe and bullying Arab traders there that did not leave certain native alone it would be the worse for them. lost no time in pledging eternal Tippu Tib and all his friends.

Cameron says Tippu Tib was the dandy he saw among the traders of that, although of negroid blood, a thorough Arab in manners and his white visitors speak of the his Arab attire and of his courtly bearing. Stanley says that at his first ing with Tippu Tib he regarded him most remarkable man he had met the Arabs, Wa Swahili, and half Africa. Lieut. Van Gale of the state, who met Tippu Tib in January says he was surprised by the extent of information on European topics. He familiar with events occurring in and was particularly interested in the lish, Germans, and Belgians. "The tions he asked me," says Van Gale, ed that he is neither an ignorant nor one of ordinary mind." He said he ed some day to go to Europe, visit the of the Belgians and also spend some in Constantinople.

In Tippu Tib's home, south of Cameron says that large gangs of walking about in chains met his every turn. They were leading easy were well fed, and he saw no act of there. All had been victims, however, the crying wrongs that are still the simple savages of Africa. They are sold among the tribes on the way to the sea. Long vans, however, richly laden with ivory are often dispatched to the coast.

It was Tippu who helped Stanley down the Congo from Nyangwe, the where both Livingstone and Cameron defeated in their efforts to follow the further. For some weeks Stanley's party was augmented by over two hundred of Tippu Tib's men. Twenty very beauties from the great trader's harem companied him on this first trip down Congo, where he is now in absolute of the river and adjoining territories about 350 miles below Nyangwe. For many miles below the falls Stanley was chased by large fleets of canoes, and party suffered severely from the incessant arrows of the most ferocious savages he met on the Congo. These natives among the most peaceable on the Congo and one good reason is that they have all weapons to fight with. They have all been disarmed by Tippu Tib for a distance of about eighty miles along the river for daring to attack some of his men. Dr. Lenz, the explorer, wrote from Stanley falls in March last that between the falls and the Aruwimi river the natives were incapable of making any resistance. "One can rarely ride among them," he writes, "a lance or some other weapon except small knives." Dr. Lenz adds that "the influence of the sultan Tippu Tib is far greater all through this region than that is of the Free Congo state."

Tippu Tib has thus far maintained very amicable relations with the whites. He has invited missionaries to settle near him, and has promised them protection.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

Delegates to the seventh annual election and picnic of the Lime Kiln Club began to arrive at midnight on Wednesday night. The first one to put in an appearance was Col. Dade Rockafellow, of Covington, Ky. He made the trip afoot in exactly twenty days. By midnight on Friday 207 honorary members and delegates had appeared and been furnished quarters. The only States not represented were Kansas, California, Nebraska, Maine and Vermont. The two New Hampshire delegates were on the road six weeks, but arrived here in a very enthusiastic mood. Among the very prominent degelgates present were thirty-four colonels, seventeen majors, fourteen judges, twenty-one professors, thirty elders and six sirs. The most commanding and the best dressed delegation were from South Carolina and, consisted of Judge Prehensile Smith, Col. Danforth Gore, Prof. Oscillation Baker and the Rev. Carmine Pathfinder.

As each delegate arrived at the hall he was dusted off with a horse brush, given a pint of iced tea and assigned to quarters with some local member. The only case of attempted fraud was on the part of a stranger claiming to be a delegate from the White Rose branch club at Sandusky, O. The credentials he submitted proved to be a recipe for mixing a horse liniment, and when flung down on his back and stepped on he admitted that he was one Samuel Davis, of Toledo, who wanted to learn the inside workings of the club and go about personating Giveadam Jones. The way he was hustled down three pair of stairs will live in his memory for a hundred years to come.

A business meeting was held in the Library Friday evening, at which all committees reported. The thanks of the club are extended to the many Detroiters who came to the front to make the banquet a grand success.

At 8 o'clock on Saturday morning, preceded by a band which threw off sweet strains at every step, the procession marched to the foot of Eighteenth street and embarked on a barge to be towed down to Fighting Island. Most of the local members were accompanied by their wives and children. Among the banners in the procession were noticed those bearing legends as follows: "Never let go of a spring chicken to look for an old hen," "Five hundred years hence the black will be on top," "The man who poisons a watermillyon deserves the rope," "We have got our heads above water."

At the island everything had been arranged for a good time. Before beginning the games which were to test the strength and agility of the members, Brother Gardner mounted a barrel and made a brief speech. He referred to Cleopatra, the siege of Troy, the New Orleans Exposition and the recent trouble with Mexico, and expressed an earnest wish that every member should stand ready to lay down his life in case the United States decided to go in and give France, Germany, Austria, Roumania and Russia a gentle drubbing. His remarks were received with such enthusiasm that Maj. Powhattan Green, a delegate from Virginia, fell in a fit and had to be soaked in the river eighteen minutes before he came to enough to miss his Waterbury watch.

The following is the list of the games, winners and prizes:

Throwing an anvil—Prize, an oil painting of a canal boat going ashore in a dreadful storm. Won by Capt. Behemoth Smith, who succeeded in throwing it on Elder Toots' left foot.

Standing jump—Prize, a kerosene lamp with a green body and warranted not to explode. Won by Prof. Serious White, who broke a pair of six shilling suspenders in so doing.

Foot-race of 100 yards—Prize, a decorated wall basket, which can also be used to hold potatoes, carry game or knock burglars out. Won by Shindig Watkins, whose divorced wife was present, and felt so elated over his victory that she returned home with him.

Boxing match—Prize, a lithograph of John L. Sullivan. Won by Giovadam Jones, who knocked out three aspirants in such a manner that they inquired what year it was when they had been revived.

High jump—Prize, a fine large bottle of cement to mend crockery and glassware. Won by Snowball Cotton, who cleared the stick held at five feet, but came down on his head and drove his neck back three inches.

Wheelbarrow race—Prize, four bunches of celery with hand painted stalks. There were eight contestants, and the prize was borne off by Truthful Taylor.

Playing the harmonican—Prize, a doormat on which was the word "Welcome." About forty members contested for this prize, and during the half hour in which the struggle took place passing schooners were driven ashore and a cyclone just missed the island. The winner was Samuel Shin, but he lay exhausted for the next half hour.

At half-past 7 o'clock in the evening Paradise Hall was thrown open and speedily filled. Brother Gardner made another speech of welcome, in which he trusted that the club would at once turn its attention to the Bulgarian and Mexico questions, and he was followed by Snowball Cotton, Sir Isaac Walpole and Col. Rigid Coleman. On motion of Difficulty Johnson, of Tennessee, Brother Gardner was re-elected President by acclamation. There was considerable strife for the other positions, and the following candidates were elected:

Vice President—Col. S. Cantilever.
Secretary—Absolute Smith.
Treasurer—Sympathy Jones.
Grand Keeper of the Seals—Snowball Cotton.

The appointment of local committees from active members will be made at the next regular meeting.

The delegates began to depart about midnight Saturday night, and by Sunday evening the great majority had headed for home, each one seeming to feel that the country had been pulled through a thrilling crisis, and was safe for another year.

Kingston News states that the particulars regarding Orla, the alleged detective, who took poison while in a Kingston hotel with his bride, have been known for some time, that it is thought wise to withheld them for the present, and that when they appear a sensation will be created.

CARRIE'S VISIT.

Carrie Welton and Alexander Hall had been lovers, but they had quarrelled and Hall had gone to Dakota. When she had no longer any chance of seeing him Carrie found that life was a rather dull affair. When, after seven months, her bachelor uncle in Dakota wrote her to come out and take up a claim she quickly concluded to do so. She wrote her uncle that she would arrive within the next three weeks, and she was with him in less than two.

"I have the lumber all ready for your little house," he said, as he drove her from the station.

Somehow she was lighter-hearted and happier since she knew she was in Dakota than she had been for months. She knew why—she did not cheat herself. It was because she was in the same country with Alexander Hall. It gave her a sense of companionship—this very knowledge

"In the morning I will take you out and show you your claim," continued her uncle. "And I've chosen this site for your cabin. It'll be about a mile from mine—just a nice walk for you when you get lonesome."

A few days later, after the legal formalities had been attended to, Uncle Tom drove Carrie out to look at the cabin that was in process of erection.

"I wonder who will be my neighbor?" queried Carrie.

"I can find out at the land office," Uncle Tom replied.

He did so and gave Carrie the desired information the next day.

"It's some fellow named Hall," he said.

Carrie felt a sudden leaping of her heart and a curious excitement at the sound of the familiar name. But was it likely that this was Alexander. It would be too wonderful to be true.

Yet it was Alexander! She saw him at the postoffice the next day and passed him without so much as a glance. He looked as if he had seen an apparition and took a step forward and then stood still, chilled by her cold glance, in which there was no recognition. After all, it was his own fault. He knew he had conducted himself like a brute and an idiot when he left Ontario. He had realized it a dozen times since—realized it constantly, in fact—with a dull heartache whenever he was alone with himself.

A greater surprise awaited him in the knowledge that Carrie's claim and cabin were just opposite his own. The two cabins were completed and furnished, and the occupants moved in. Alexander's was the more pretentious of the two in the exterior, and Carrie's the more sumptuous within. For she had brought her books and she had a few plants, and with these indescribable feminine ornaments, which some women seem to create by a turn of their hand, her rooms were very cozy.

She occasionally saw Alexander, but they never recognized each other; yet there was a sense of protection in the knowledge that he was so near.

One November day Carrie was "tacking a comforter," which she had pieced together out of bits of calico. The wind had been blowing with increasing fury from the northwest all day. Toward evening it became terrible, and a sleety snow began to fall. It seemed to shake the frail little cabin to its foundation. Carrie felt her heart sink with fear. This was something beyond any of her former experiences and she remembered what uncle Tom had said of a "blizzard."

"This must surely be a blizzard," she thought.

Higher and higher rose the wind, louder and still louder it shrieked. The walls of the house shook, trembled, and then—Carrie was conscious of being lifted into the air by some unseen force, and whirled through the darkness and then falling. After that all was blank.

She was only stunned, and when she opened her eyes she found herself in a confused mass of ruins, and Alexander Hall kneeling by her calling her name.

"It was not necessary to come over," she said, "I am not hurt in the least."

"Come over!" he repeated, breaking into a laugh. "It is you who have come over, Miss Carrie; and I am very glad to see you, even in this unceremonious manner."

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"Why, I mean that you came, house and all, and planted yourself right in my dooryard with a thunderous clatter. It is a wonder your neck was not broken, my dear."

"Do you really mean, Alexander, that my house blew over into your yard?"

"I mean just that, Carrie. I always thought your cabin rather shaky—mine is twice as substantial—and now you will be obliged to accept my hospitality for the present. Fortunately I have a man and wife stopping with me this week. They have slept soundly through all this blizzard. They are used to the country. But I will wake the good woman now, and she will attend to you."

The next day Alexander said to her: "Since you consent sufficiently to call upon me in such an unceremonious manner, Carrie, before I beg your pardon for my old disagreeable meanness, can't you stoop still further and marry me, now that I do most humbly crave your forgiveness? I have always loved you."

Of course Carrie could not refuse.

Pierce's 'Favorite Prescription,' and it cured her." Such facts as the above need no comment.

The great reputation of Briggs' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near like it as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves.

Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Eclectric Oil," "Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Sprains and Bruises, complaints arising from Colds such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

$80,000 to loan on easy terms and at low rates of interest Wm. Jackson Markdale.

East Grey Liberal Conservative convention next Monday in Markdale, in Roller Rink.

Oz. Walker has enlargened his residence and had it vaneered with brick, which adds very much to it appearance.

D. R. Ellis of Euphrasia exhibited 20 distinct varieties of fine apples all correctly named at the Glenelg Fall Show held in Markdale last week.

Mr. Fawcett of the Advance was at the Presbyterian concert here on Friday night and favored the audience with a recitation and reading. The latter was really well given and enjoyed.

Mr. R. McNally of Chatsworth has fully decided to come to Markdale to carry on the carriage manufacturing business, and will move here immediately.

Thos. McNea has built an addition to his new factory, vaneered the whole with brick, and it is now the most capacious, substantial and thoroughly equipped planing, sash and door factory in the county.

Notice.—All persons indebted to the Estate of J. R. Trimble are hereby notified that unless the acc'ts and past due notes are paid to W. Lucas & Co. by the 20th inst. the same will be placed in court for collection.

Too Small.—There is great need for more room in the Agricultural hall. It could be enlarged at a small cost by raising the roof and adding another story, the upper flat to be used for ladies department, fruit, &c.

Mr. John Gordon, lot 4 con. 11, St. Vincent, will sell his farm stock, implements, &c., on Tuesday, October the 19th, commencing at one o'clock. He has sold his farm and all must be disposed of. Usual terms. W. J. Shepherdson, auctioneer.

We regret that Mr. Wm. Mutrie has decided to remove from this neighborhood, as he and better half are among our most respectable and prosperous neighbors. He is selling his chattels to-day, and will move shortly to Wellington Co.

The concert in Chatsworth last Monday evening, in aid of the town hall building fund, was a grand success. The house was so "packed" that some of the performers who came a little late had to come in thro' a window in the rear. Our noted Scottish vocalist, Mr. J. R. Anderson, and Irish comic, W. J. Benson, caused the large and appreciative audience to overflow with mirth and applause.

Commendable.—A handsome and substantial fence has just been completed in front of the new Methodist Church in this village. The fence is built of dressed stone with iron top. Mr. Robt. Johnston did the mason work, and also the new six foot sidewalk across the whole front, 8 rods. The work is indeed a credit to Mr. Johnston. The iron work by Moffat Bro's of the Markdale foundry; they always do a good job. The design of the cresting is very handsome. The above improvements in front of this handsome edifice adds greatly to its appearance.

Bazaar and Concert.—The ladies of the Presbyterian Church held their annual bazaar on the Agricultural grounds on the second day of the Fair, and, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, did a very fair business. The concert, which they held in Haskett's Hall same evening, was well attended considering the most unfavorable state of the weather and roads. The program was rendered efficiently, and the attention excellent. Flesherton talent was conspicuous and very acceptable. Everything passed off pleasant and terminating at an early hour.

For Fur Mantles, Caps, Muffs, and everything nice in Millinery, call and see M. Richardson & Co's full stock.

Mr. Jenkins devoted a large space in the Chronicle last week to the benifit? of the Standard, together with some three other locals exchanges. In his article he insinuates, prevaricates and lies straight, but remembering where it comes from, we consider he and his babbling utterly beneath our further notice.

HEALTH.

Schools And Myopia.

Myopia is the scientific name of short-sightedness. We have more than once called attention to it in some of its aspects. Its importance leads us to recur to it again. The New York Medical Record says there can be no doubt that it is increasing; that eighty per cent. of the students in the Polytechnic School of France have to wear glasses.

Sarcey, a French writer, and a victim to the disease, declares it to be spreading through Europe like some epidemic. But most of us hardly need to go beyond our own observation and experience to be satisfied of the fact of its increase. It is so common for young school-girls to wear glasses, that glasses seem almost like a new and grotesque fashion. Neither the father nor the mother of the writer, nor any of their ancestry, were myopic, and yet five of their children, including the writer, are so.

That this tendency is due to our modern system of schools is plain. It is developed during the school age, and extends and intensifies as the school years go on; and though, when thus developed, it may increase during life, it is not developed at all after about the age of twenty.

The cause is partly imperfect light, which necessitates bringing the eyes too near the book page, but mainly the bad habit into which children fall, and which is not corrected by the teacher, of holding the head down too near the book when there is no need to do so.

Now the lens of the eye naturally changes to adapt itself to the varying distances of objects; but keeping the eye too near its object during the growing period of childhood and youth forces the lens permanently in the form suited only to near sight.

The defect may be looked on as a slight matter in its earlier stages, but it tends to increase, and that sometimes to the stage of organic disorganization.

Says the Record. "M. Sarcey urges his readers with profound emphasis to remember that myopia always has a tendency to increase unless precautions are taken; and that all myopic eyes are weak eyes to be looked after carefully. In his own case, the results of over-use and misuse, especially of his attempt to get along without glasses, were that he lost the sight of one eye entirely, through detachment of the retina, and that a cataract developed in the other."

M. Sarcey himself says, "Remember that extreme myopia ends in cataract, and that nearly all myopia may become extreme, if the eyes are abused."

Doctoring For Every Little Ailment.

Many people fall ill of disease simply through fear of it. The imagination has a powerful influence over the human body. One can very easily imagine himself to be catching cold at the sight of an open window, when if he had not known the window was open, or was not afraid of its effects, he would escape the cold. Doctors understand this secret, but they do not impart it to their patients. Most invalids, real or supposed, would be angry if a physician would say to them: "Nothing ails you, you only think so." They prefer to think themselves sick, and in time they really become so, for nature, though she struggles hard, can not stand everything. Too many drugs will finally destroy her healing power.

These people who love to have a box of white pills in bottles, and a little book, all kept in some handy place, so that when a friend who has eaten too much dinner says: "Oh, I am fearfully nervous!" they may run for the little book, look for "nervousness," and administer so many pills of bryonia. When they have a headache, instead of dieting or eating more moderately, they take several drops of some nice poison. They trust nothing to nature, but call in a doctor for every little ailment, when fresh bir, exercise, and strict temperance in eating and drinking is all they need.

Forebodings of Incipient Insanity.

1. Irritability and tendency to take offense.
2. Moroseness and silence, or sometimes faultfinding with servants.
3. Suspicion and jealousy of best friends.
4. Impairment of memory, forgetting hours of meals.
5. Inattention to exercise and state of bowels.
6. Neglect of personal appearance.
7. Altered facial expression, notably in melancholia, with marked furrows.
8. Prominence and brilliancy of cornæ, in hysterical and puerperal mania.

Bodily Symptoms.—

1. Harsh, dry skin as a rule, though sometimes perspiring.
2. Sometimes a peculiar odor.
3. Coated tongue, with offensive breath.
4. Constipation and feeble circulation.
5. Headache and palor of face.
6. Subjective deafness, or abnormal auditory sensations.
7. Altered conversational style, and talking to ones-self.
8. Delusions and illusions later on.

Sour Milk in Atonic Dyspepsia.

This seems like a novel remedy, yet Dr. W. O'Neill tells us that he has found sour milk a good remedy in many cases of dyspepsia, or, at all events, it is a good adjuvant in the treatment of slow digestion where flatulence and a sensation of cramp in the stomach are prominent symptoms. The good effects of sour milk were casually discovered by him some months ago, and since then he has prescribed it with satisfactory results in many cases of indigestion. If the curd of the milk should disagree with the patient, it should be strained off, and the whey can then be given, or taken a short time after meals, warm. A gentleman who suffered much from flatulence and other disagreeable symptoms after meals can now keep himself free from them by drinking, half an hour or so after eating, a tumblerful or half a tumblerful of ordinary cold sour milk, which to him is a most agreeable beverage. He believes the efficacy of sour milk in atonic indigestion is owing in a great measure to the lactic acid which it contains, which acid some physiologists say is one of the ingredients of the gastric fluid.

Aristocratic Babies.

Children who are constantly held and watched and tended rarely thrive. They grow fretful, uneasy and pale; no one seems to know why. The rich woman's baby is at a disadvantage in this respect, unless money as it may sometime, procure an intelligent, faithful nurse—a foster mother. To intrust an infant to these nurses is almost as much an act of abandonment as is that of the heathen mother, who throws her babe into the jaws of the crocodile of the sacred river. The children who have grown up through a wretched childhood to a crippled and deformed maturity caused by the carelessness of nurses, who have let them fall or injure themselves in other ways, are not a few. Children need freedom from unnatural restraint in order to develop their own individualities. Deprived of it, they become more helpless and dependent. The ability of children when they grow up is greatly lessened by too much restriction in childhood.

Creosote a Specific for Erysipelas.

Dr. J. H. Cox gives some experience of his own in this remedy, and says: "All injuries of whatever kind, have been treated with dressings of this remedy, and where this has been done from first to last, in no instance has there been an attack of erysipelas."

The usual manner of application, was in solution, of six to twenty drops, to the ounce of water, keeping the parts covered with cloths constantly wet with it. In ulcers or wounds it may be used in the form of a poultice, by stirring ground slippery elm into the solution. The strength to be regulated according to the virulence of the attack. Ordinarily, ten drops to the ounce is strong enough for the cutaneous form of the disease, and in dressings for wounds or recent injuries. If the inflammation threatens to spread rapidly, it should be increased to twenty or more drops to the ounce of water.

Diphtheria.

Dr. R. Couetoux, of France, reports two cases, aged six and nine years, says that when death was apparently imminent, and tracheotomy had been refused as a last resort, he ordered inhalations of steam, tinctured with cubebs, of which twenty-five grammes were placed in the boiler at once, the steam being conveyed by tubes to the beds of the children to be inhaled by them. Both made a good recovery. Dr. Couetoux says that cubebs used in this way against the diphtheria is more powerful than eucalyptus, glycerine, tar, or the essence of terebinthina.

He Was Green, But He Got the Job.

"A young man from the country came in the other day looking for a situation," said a well-known merchant. "I rather liked the boy's looks, and, after inquiring about his mercantile experience, his education, his expectation in the way of salary, etc., I asked him if he had any references.

"'References!' he exclaimed. 'What are they?'

"'Why,' I tried to explain, 'can't you give us the name of some prominent man in your town so we can write to him? We want to make some inquiries about you, you know.'

"'Inquiries about me?' he rejoined, with an open month and in his frank way; 'great jewhilikens, man, if you want to know anything about me just ask me. I know more than anybody else, and there's no use writing way down in the country for that.'

"You couldn't have any doubt of the honesty of a man like that, could you?" concluded the merchant. "The boy is now working in our store, and will make a success, too."

Gordon's Bible Enshrined.

In one of the great picture galleries at Windsor Castle are several precious caskets, among other exquisite objets de vertu. The Queen entered one day with a small book in her hand, and asked the keeper of these treasures which was the most rare and valuable of all the caskets. He showed her one made of pure rock crystal, ornamented with gold and enamel. In this casket the Queen placed the small book—General Gordon's pocket Bible, annotated and marked by his own hand—and in this precious casket will remain this most precious relic of one of England's greatest heroes.

FARM.

Keeping Farm Accounts.

BY JOHN M. STAHL.

I am a farmer, and have "kept books" for many years. No other work will prove more satisfactory and profitable, and it is not too difficult for any farmer of ordinary ability. The system once begun, he will wonder how he ever got along without it, and find that it makes money for him every day. Get a rather narrow "cash book," opposite pages for debit and credit. It is best to keep this book where you will see it every evening.

If "Dr." and "Cr." bother you, head the one side, "Money Paid Out," and the other "Money Taken In." Saturday night transcribe all the week's items in the cash book on to the proper accounts in what I shall call the Ledger. This should be a long, thick, but narrow book, as you will find it easier to have the two sides of accounts on opposite pages. In the ledger, you will want to keep a number of accounts, but the two of most importance are to be headed "Farm" and "Family." Let Farm accounts be first of all, and thirty or forty pages further along begin the family accounts. On the farm account credit the farm with everything it brings in; on the opposite page debit it with everything paid out for it.

This account will have many items not on the cash account—such as labor in the fields, repairs to machinery, implements, fences, buildings, etc., credits of poultry, eggs, butter, etc., exchanged for groceries, of wheat exchanged for flour, of produce consumed by the family, etc. You ask, Why not put the items in the cash account, or on a merchandise account in the cash book? At first sight it appears that this would be the proper thing to do; but experience has shown me otherwise. First, it is not necessary, and unnecessary work is always to be avoided. Paying out or receiving money is so simple a transaction that it is necessary to put down the items at the close of each day, else some will be forgotten. But labor on the farm, or expended in repairs, may be safely left till Saturday night, for you can remember easily enough the work of each day during the week.

Also, if you go to mill and exchange ten bushels of wheat for flour, you will not forget the transaction till Saturday night; your grocer's book, or bills, etc., will show each item, Cr. and Dr., of the week's trading at the store. Hence, it is not necessary to put these items down each night, and by not doing so you will save considerable work. Another thing: while your accounts must be complete so far as they go, the shorter and simpler they are the better. The more there are of them, the more difficult they will be to keep, and the less satisfactory for reference. You do not want to load your cash account down with merchandise items, for that would destroy its character and make it too voluminous for ready reference; and a merchandise account proper is difficult and perplexing.

While all the items in the farm account must be properly specified, to get in the figures it will be necessary to reduce them to a cash basis. Here is the thing, above all others, which deters farmers from keeping accounts. They fancy it is impossible to reduce the items to a cash basis. This is simply because they have never tried it. It is easy enough. Suppose you have taken ten bushels of wheat to mill and exchanged it for flour. Ask the miller what he will give you cash for that wheat, or find its market value in cash by some other means. You now know just the cash value of that wheat at the time of the transaction, which is just the amount you are to credit the farm with, at the same time charging it with the time of yourself and team, etc., expended in marketing the wheat.

This brings us to another thing; How to reduce labor of man and beast, and wear of implements to a cash basis. Suppose you have plowed for a day. The farm is to be charged with the labor of yourself and team and the wear of the plow. To estimate the wear of the plow, for instance, would be impossible. But if you were to go and plow for some neighbor with your own team and plow, or were to hire some man to plow for you with his team and plow, you would receive in the one case, or give in the other, a certain sum; and it is this sum that the farm is to be charged with. For it is always to be supposed that the price paid is the value of the article, since that is its market value; and that this is the proper amount with which to charge the farm you will be further convinced when you consider that if you had expended the labor elsewhere you would have received this amount.

In the family account are to be put down all items for family expense, and on the credit side a fair equivalent for the labor of the family. By crediting the family with what their labor would bring elsewhere, the account will be greatly simplified. Farm labor in the house and fields is usually computed by so much with board. Hence the family is to be credited with this, and everything used on the table. It will be seen that I keep the family account differently from the way usually recommended, crediting it, not charging it with the table supplies. But it is charged with all family expenses other than board and lodging. "Board" in the country usually includes lodging, and therefore these items will include rent of and repairs on house, greatly simplifying the account again.

A little thought will show you that this family account, in connection with the farm account, puts you in command of the situation. First, it shows your living expenses. These you can add up at the end of each month and set the amount down on another page, or you can keep each item in another account. Second, it shows whether or not your farm brings a good return, for from it you get the items of household labor for which the farm is to be ultimately charged, and the items of articles produced by that household labor, which the farm is to be ultimately credited. But you will find it the better plan to keep the farm account in the way I have pointed out, and to bring in these items, expressed in totals, as a supplement to the farm account at the end of the year.

From these two accounts you can make up several others which you will want to keep, and which will undoubtedly occur to you. If you wish to keep accounts with each field, crop, class and lot of farm stock, etc., you can do so; but, perhaps you would better defer this till the second year, for the first year confining yourself to the work I have marked out; and then, as soon as you have mastered this work, begin to keep these other smaller but scarcely less important accounts. You will be surprised at the ease of the work, and each day you will more and more appreciate the value of it, until, when you have kept books of account for two years, you will no more think of farming without them than of farming without land.

The father claims damages from the city, and the city now seeks to throw the responsibility upon Mr. Lamontague, alleging that the accident was caused by building material placed by him in the street in front of a building he was erecting.

Some young men of St. Thomas, under the influence of liquor, went to the room of a young lady about midnight lately, and ordered her to get out of bed, robe, and open the door, stating that they had a warrant for her and would force the door if she did not comply with their wishes. When she emerged in the hall they stated she was not the party they were looking for. A young man in the same house who was awakened by the noise and came out into the hall and remonstrated with the disorderly visitors for their unfeeling conduct, was struck over the head with a lantern.

There was found dead in a lane at Winnipeg the other day an old man named Andrew Allison. He came to Winnipeg from Australia, and it is supposed was on his way home to Ireland. During the four months of his residence in Winnipeg he lived in a most miserly manner, depriving himself of the necessaries of life, and seldom leaving his room. But on his person was found a sum of money—23 English sovereigns, some change in silver, and a deposit receipt from the Bank of Victoria, at Hamilton, Australia, for £767—and a valuable watch and chain. His attire and general appearance, however, indicated extreme poverty, and it is believed that despite his apparent wealth he was not anxious to prolong his life.

On Thursday last an attempt was made to blow up the Northern & Western railway bridge at Doaktown, N. B. The explosion occurred between two and one o'clock in the morning and roused the whole neighborhood. The bridge has three spans, only one of which is fully completed. A young man named J. C. Landon, of Blenheim, quarrelled with his wife, and became so enraged that he attempted to shoot her. The pair have only been married a year, but are said to have quarrelled frequently. In the course of the [illegible] the wife alleged that the husband did not provide for her. He said she always had enough to eat. She said yes, when he went to her father's and got it. He replied that she said that again he would shoot her. She said it, and he pulled a revolver from his pocket, put it about a foot from her breast and pulled the trigger, but it did not go off; he tried again, and this time the ball went through her clothes close to her side, but did not touch her. She escaped from the house. Landon has only one eye, and wears glasses, and it is probably owing to this fact that his wife is not seriously injured. He has been committed to gaol at Chatham to stand his trial at the next assizes.

RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

E AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER I.

THE RIFT SHOWS HER TEETH AND FIGHTS.

was Heaven's artillery, or man's mock-rdinance, that awakened the echoes of Lizard Point, on the Kentish coast of England, on the night of a drear November day in the year of Grace, 1822.

With a sullen boom came the dull sound of the surging sea and then with a sharp, ringing echo, the concussion would die away face to face of the rugged cliff, until repeated by a following report that again agitated the murky air.

With a hissing roar, too, upon the pebbly beach came the huge rollers from the storm-vexed channel and deeper and deeper still seemed the dense mist of that wintry eve to wed sea and land, folding up in its murky dark embrace cliff and beach, and rock and sea and lighthouse top and rocking buoy confounding earth and ocean in one seething mass of white vapor, through which glistened the saline particles that floated above the surface of the sea.

Boom! came the sullen-sound again; and then there followed a sharp, rattling sound, which, to a practiced ear, might suggest the report of small arms, although where the firing contest could be going on—whether on the actual coast or to the left, bending to the Northern Ocean, or to the right, where the waters of the channel washed the most southern shores of England, it was difficult to tell, owing to the many different densities of the atmosphere the sounds were developed in various directions most capriciously.

But there were two persons on the shore who seemed—either from accurate forknowledge, or instinctively from the interest they felt in a something, that these sounds suggested danger—to guess their import.

In a little hollow formed by a dip of the head of the beetling cliffs on either side of it, which little hollow led by an irregular track right down a jagged, slippery and precipitous pathway to the storm-lashed beach, were these two persons. The mist of the November eve was about them in pulsating masses. The damp exhalations settled heavily on their clothing; but for a time they neither moved nor spoke not—all other senses seemed absorbed in the one of intense listening.

Then it was with startling earnestness that one of those persons spoke, and by the tone that the other gave aud his sudden exclamation of surprise it was evident that up to that moment he did not know of the presence of his companion, and that companion's voice, although there was distress in its tones, was sweet and gentle and lingered like music on the murky air.

"Gerald! Gerald! dear Gerald! they will kill him, and who will love me then? He must not want to go; he clung to me—to me, poor and so weak! Gerald! Gerald! they will kill him!"

An agony of tears followed these few words and from the tones and from the tears the rough man who was on that pinnacle of rock knew who it was that stood by him, or rather crouched by him—although he could see sufficient of her form to make her look like some fair spirit of the mist that was about them.

"Why, Miss Grace," he said, "who of the world would suppose you to be here? You had better go back, miss; there's a gale blowing seaward and it will blow great guns through the old gorge when it does once. Go back, miss; you really had much better."

And the young girl—the child we may call her; for scarcely fourteen years had passed over that gentle head—still wept, and in heart-breaking accents she pronounced the name of Gerald!

"It's no use, miss," said the man; "he's gone on his first voyage, though much of a voyage it is not; but on his first venture, as we may call it, and Captain Dolan will take good care of him. Hem!"

The man coughed, as if he found it necessary to himself to mark the equivocal sort of care that was to be taken of the person in question.

"He will be killed," sighed the young girl. "He will be killed!—gentle, good, kind, dear Gerald! There! You hear that? You hear, Joseph?" Boom! boom! came the rapid reports of cannon. "Oh! my poor, dear brother, my poor Gerald! It was so cruel, so very cruel to take him! I will not live here; I will go far away; I shall see all the days and nights that are to come. He did love me—no one ever loved me but Gerald—dear, dear Gerald! I will go to the town: I will tell all—all I know; I will save Gerald! There, again!—the cruel guns! They are killing him! [illegible] know he does not love him—never! never! [illegible] does not. He does not love him—never! never! [illegible] would not; I will not [illegible] him to my father—he shall not be [illegible] he is not good to us, and [illegible] dear Gerald to kill him [illegible] and there will be nobody to [illegible] any kind words to me—[illegible] nobody! I will die—I wish I could [illegible] now."

"Don't you go on so, miss. Ah!"

This exclamation from the man who was then on the cliffs, as a sort of sentinel, was occasioned by rather a curious [illegible] That there was an agitation in the air that his practiced eyes saw betokened wind was manifest by the manner in which the mist had become parted on the surface of the sea. In some strange way the wind had commenced, its operations considerably above the surface of the channel, and at about a couple of hundred feet over the surging water, there was a tolerably clear night atmosphere, all below being a dense, moving mass of vapor, which hid all things. The phenomenon we have alluded to was the sudden projection from out of this misty ocean right up into the clear air, of a rocket, the blue tints of which scattered themselves for a moment in a shower of sparkling spray, that fell extinguished into the mist below.

The exclamation of the scout on the cliff had attracted the attention of Grace; and she removed her hands from over her eyes and face, where she had clasped them and looked up.

"What is that?"

"Nothing, Miss Grace—nothing."

"Ah, I see! A shower of blue lights from the sky!"

She had seen the last of the rocket, and in another moment all was darkness again.

"Is it a broken star?" she said.

"Perhaps so, miss; but indeed, miss, you must not stay here!"

"I will stay here!"

"But I—really, miss—where is Mrs. Wagner?"

"I don't know, Joseph. I don't want to know. You are not so—so unkind as the rest, and you will let me stay?"

"Spikes and bolts!" muttered the man to himself. "I can't help it; I can't make her go. The signal must show and there's an end of it!"

Grace had not been able to see what he was about, but in reality, from the moment that he had seen the rocket emerge from the misty sea, he had been busy; for it was a special duty he was placed there to perform. From a small case that looked as if it might inclose a fishing-rod, he took a piece of iron rod, about four feet in height, one end of which was spiked and sharpened, and by that means he stuck it up in the scant loam that covered the chalk cliff. This iron rod was hollow, and in the upper end of it he inserted what looked like an iron saucer, with a projection at its under side, to fit into the hollow of the tube. Into that saucer then he broke what looked like a cartridge. Another moment and he had lit a match, which lie protected in the hollow of his hand. He placed the match in the saucer among the contents or the seeming cartridge. There was a slight evolution of smoke and then a beautiful blue flame shot upward and cast its radiance upon the old cliff and streamed out upon the mist and the sea.

The man had at the moment of lighting this beacon flung himself flat in the hollow, but the young girl had risen from her crouching position to her feet and the beautiful flame shone on her fair face and clustering ringlets, making her look like something more than mortal in her wondrous beauty and for a moment or two so mazing the eyes of Joseph that he was unable until he had gazed upon the lovely vision for some time to recollect that he ought to remove her from proximity to the light even as he had removed himself, and then he cried:

"Oh, Miss Grace—Miss Grace—don't stand there. The captain will see you with his night glass, and you know what he is when he has his fits of rage upon him. Don't stay there."

"Oh, how beautiful!"

With a whirling rush, in a moment more, the mist disappeared from the face of the sea; it was encountered by a fresh breeze from the southeast, which crumpled it up like a scroll in the fire, and in an instant chased it away thousands of miles to far-off oceans, or, decomposing it, caused it to fall into the huge Atlantic in millions of sparkling particles. Bright, beautiful and stately to them appeared the broad disk of a full moon in the east, and in an instant every wave was crested with the glow of molten silver. The huge cliffs reflected back the brightness, and earth, air and water became each moment more suffused with the gentle lustre of the glorious satellite.

"Beautiful, oh, beautiful!" again cried Grace, as she clasped her hands and stepped yet closer to the verge of the beetling cliff.

The scout had flung a heavy piece of tarpaulin over the blue-light and extinguished it.

"Spikes and bolts!" were the only words he had uttered—the expression being a favorite one in the way of exclamation, and meaningless in all other respects.

"The Rift—the Rift!" cried Grace, now as she stood still nearer to the verge of the cliff, and her luxuriant fair hair, being now cast by the night breeze, was scattered in wild and beautiful confusion about her neck and shoulders.

"The Rift! I see it now; and Gerald will come back—he will not go again. Dear Gerald; I do love him!"

The tears again started to her eyes and took the place to her of the mist that had been upon the sea, for they obscured her vision for a few seconds, during which she sobbed bitterly; for a dread that Gerald, of whom she spoke in such terms of fond affection, might be hurt or killed, lay heavily at her young heart.

"Yes, the Rift!" said Joseph.

From the motion of his hand toward the sea and from the direction of his gaze, it was evident that, by this name Rift, he indicated a cutter-rigged vessel, which was apparently beating up before the wind for the deep bay that was at that part of the coast and which formed so well sheltered. Why or therefore the Rift was making for this bay, shall soon perceive; but, by the aspect of affairs at sea, it would appear to be a suicidal act—considering that, not two miles distant, she was evidently pursued by a [illegible] carrying such a press of sail as to endanger to overtake her agile enemy, that she at times appeared to careen almost to the water's edge, and but that the breeze was unusually steady, would have run great risk.

"The Rift?" said Grace, in an interrogative tone.

"And that?" She indicated the other vessel.

"The Spray."

"Spray—Spray?" Oh, that is the name of the ship."

"His Majesty's revenue schooner, Miss Grace—the Spray—in chase of the Rift, smuggling cutter, Captain Dolan owner and captain. There, Miss Grace, now you have heard it all—if you did not know it before."

"I did know it. He told me."

"Your father?"

"He."

"She won't call him father," muttered Joseph to himself. "She said she wouldn't since the day he struck her on the beach when the Norwegian wreck drifted in."

"He told me," added Grace, speaking in a musing tone. "He told me that, to get money, the people who had the power to do so made wicked laws, for the love of money, and [illegible] people should not bring [illegible] to another the things that [illegible] Rift." said Grace, in an interrogative tone.

"And that?" She indicated the other vessel.

"The Spray."

"Spray—Spray?" Oh, that is the name of the ship."

"His Majesty's revenue schooner, Miss Grace—the Spray—in chase of the Rift, smuggling cutter, Captain Dolan owner and captain. There, Miss Grace, now you have heard it all—if you did not know it before."

"I did know it. He told me."

"Your father?"

"He."

"She won't call him father," muttered Joseph to himself. "She said she wouldn't since the day he struck her on the beach when the Norwegian wreck drifted in."

"He told me," added Grace, speaking in a musing tone. "He told me that, to get money, the people who had the power to do so made wicked laws, for the love of money, and [illegible] people should not bring [illegible] to another the things that each produced for the good of all; that, when he tried to do so, they pursued him, and called it wrong, and wicked, and smuggling."

"That's it, miss."

"I don't know; but he should not take Gerald—poor, dear Gerald? Heaven help him!"

There was a long streak of cloud, into which the rapidly rising moon now swept, and a gloom came over the sea and the shore. The wind seemed to blow with keener fury; and but dimly could be seen the Rift, as she scudded directly for the deep bay.

The scene that now took place, at a distance of not more than three-quarters of a mile from the shore, was deeply interesting, and as seen by the scout and by Grace from the cliff-top, had a strange aspect of nearness, and yet disconnection with them, that imparted to it a curious and mysterious character.

Still tearing along through the water, with every inch of canvas she could carry, came the king's ship, and it was quite evident that she decreased the distance between her and the cutter at a rate that was, or that should have been, very alarming to the latter.

But to the surprise of all on board the Spray, doubtless, it was evident that the Rift was shortening sail—shortening sail just as she might have done had she been quietly beating in to some friendly port, with no enemy, intent upon her destruction, at her heels.

That a contest had taken place between the two little vessels was evident from the condition of some of the top-hamper of the schooner and a white jagged streak, that looked splinter-like, on the side of the Rift, seemed to indicate that a shot or more had struck her, still this shortening sail—this cool embaying herself with her implacable foe rushing on the wings of the wind behind her and now as she—that is the cutter—was cut off from some of the breeze by the projecting headland, that foe made three feet to one in progress of its chase—what could it mean?

Bang! bang! went the two stern guns of the schooner and the dense smoke then broke over the king's ship and for a few moments wrapped it up in that cloud of its own creating. Then what the cutter meant to do seemed to be apparent—ridiculously apparent, congratulatingly apparent—to all on board the king's ship—madly apparent.

To fight!

Yes, surely the cutter Rift meant to fight, to have a ship-to-ship set-to with the Spray—to engage a vessel double its size, with four times its force—a king's ship, well manned, heavily armed and with nothing to fear; that miserable little cutter—fleet as a bird, but only ever finding safety in flight. That cutter, with its ten men and four guns! Fight! yes that must surely be it and it had chosen the more still waters of the bay for the contest. It can mean nothing else. it is in a trap. The tall cliffs are on her bow—the Spray on her track—the headland to starboard and a long line of beetling cliffs well to port. Shut in—caught—sacrificed!

A wild ringing cheer came over the water; it arose from the crew of the Spray, who for fourteen weary months had done nothing but chase, cruise and lose the Rift. It was a special duty of the Spray to capture, sink, blow to atoms and burn the Rift, and now they had her—now, now!

"Hurrah, hurrah!"

How that ringing cheer came upon the night wind; how it echoed from the bold face of the old cliffs and surged back again to the sea.

"Hurrah, hurrah!"

And no sound from the Rift. On—on still it took its light, sparkling way—beautiful in the now very faint beams of that still glorious, though partially obscured, moon.

Shot after shot from the Spray tore over the surface of the bay, and Grace on the cliff top swooned in dismay as she seemed to see each of those deadly missiles winging through the dear heart of her Gerald, whom she loved so well—her own dear brother, who was all the world to her.

"They will kill him—oh, they are killing him now! Gerald—Gerald—Gerald!"

She sank down close to the face of the cliff and wrung her hands in agony.

"We have no mother—none, none—no father. He is no father to us; and now Gerald will be killed. Oh, Joseph! Joseph! is it not wicked—very wicked?"

"Hush, Miss Grace! Hush! Look again. Spikes and bolts! it is a close brush to-night."

The crew of the Spray cheered, and fired at the Rift for some ten minutes, and the cutter still sailed on, taking no sort of notice. Right into the centre of the bay, shortening sail still as she went, one by one, the canvas wings fluttered for a moment, and then collapsed and were furled—still her headway was great and she was right before the wind. The Spray was hidden in the smoke from her own guns, but a couple of boats were manning and arming from her quarters to take possession of the Rift.

Then with sharp, precise reports, the Rift's small guns opened fire. Dense smoke fell into the face of the wind, and was thrown back again over the cutter, and still through it could be seen the bright flash of her guns as they were served with rapidity. There [illegible] the approaches of a fight, and Lieutenant Royle, of the Spray, roared and swore, and stamped on his quarter-deck, for the boats to put off and board the Rift.

"She has ceased firing, sir," said the gunner of the Spray.

"Can't see, sir, for the smoke."

"Cease firing."

Bang! went the last gun on board the Spray, even as the order came from the speaking-trumpet of the Lieutenant, and then an awful silence seemed to succeed to the sharp reports and the smoke from both of the vessels gradually began to curl up and dissipate.

As the wind set, the vapor caused by the firing from the king's ship rolled over in huge masses toward the cliffs and the Rift, while that in which the smuggling cutter had enveloped itself hung about it and occupied very much of the space lying between it and the shore, as there was scarcely any escape for it in that direction.

All this produced an obscurity in the [illegible] a great [illegible] in the case some hour before, when the mist was on the waters before the rising of the moon.

But this was a state of things which did not last long. The denser clouds, which had swept between the moon and the southwest on their course, [illegible] current that had brought them from the N. W., [illegible] them away, and with a fuller flood of glory than before, the moonbeams danced upon the waves.

The smoke from the cannonade rolled up the faces of the cliffs and toppled over, and was whirled away by the breeze inland. Sea, and beach, and cliff shone clearly out in the silvery light, and there was the Spray beating off and on in the offing. There were her two boats in the middle of the bay.

But where was the Rift?

Gone! utterly gone, and left not a vestige behind, vanished, resolved into the elements. Deep in the "salt waves of the vasty deep," or whirled off in some wild tornado to unknown seas—gone! gone! There were the white, tall cliffs; there the high tide that roared and lashed their bases; there the headland; there the land-locked bay and there the surging sea. But the Rift?

Gone! gone!

CHAPTER II.

THE PIRATE BROUGHT TO BY A BOY.

It was early dawn on the morning of that same day, the evening of which had seemed to close so disastrously for the smuggling cutter Rift, that, looking like a sea bird in the Wintry mist that hung upon the water, she slowly fought her way against almost a head-wind within a few miles of the French coast.

Dim and indistinct, with only here and there a headland that rose into a more prominent relief against the leadened colored sky, appeared the coast hills. A baffling wind at times threw the Rift a point or two out of her course, and a peculiar wash of the sea once or twice nearly broached her to.

"Keep her easy!" roared Captain Dolan, as he suddenly emerged from his cabin, with an inflamed countenance and every appearance of having indulged in early potations. "Keep her easy! Is it headway or leeway that the lubber is making? Where's the Coquette?"

"Why, I take it," growled Ben Bowline, the mate of the cutter—"I take it that she is rounding the headland, thereaway."

"Ah!"

Captain Dolan sprang on to the carriage of one of the two guns that the Rift, when out at sea, got up from her hold and prepared for service. He took a long look in the direction of the French coast and ran his eye from bay to headland, and along the narrow, bright bit of sand that marked a portion of it, and then, pausing in his search he said:

"I see her. As lubberly as usual—yawning about like a dead whale. Keep off a point, Martin. That will do. Let her come out with her cargo. I won't hug the shore for any Frenchman that lives."

"Ay, ay, sir!"

The course of the Rift was slightly altered a point to the north and the light canvas she carried strained more easily to the wind. The foam rippled past her with a freshening noise, and she evidently made more headway than he had done. Captain Dolan looked from one to the other of his crew with a scowling brow, and then, waving his hand imperatively, he cried:

"All aft here! All aft!"

The smugglers emerged from all parts of the cutter and gathered in a disorderly throng a little aft of midship, when Dolan, in a hoarse, harsh voice, addressed them:

"It's share and share alike, shipmates, in all our ventures, except two for the captain and one for the Rift. It's share and share alike of all danger; but I know there are some of you who think, because I said this should be the last year of the Rift with me as her owner and captain, that I meant to play you false; and, like old Morgan of the Wisp that you have all heard of, sell cutter and crew to the Philistines, as the last good speculation of captain and owner."

A growling kind of murmur passed among the crew, which it would have been difficult to take for either assent or dissent with any certainty. Captain Dolan paid no heed to it, but proceeded, while a flash of indescribable cunning and malignity came from his eyes.

"But," he roared, "but I am going to prove to you all that I can't and won't betray you. To smuggle is one thing—to fire on a king's ship is another: one is fine and imprisonment—the other is death!"

A look of deepening interest came over the faces of the crew, and the man at the wheel leaned heavily on the iron spokes, as he bent forward to catch all that passed.

"You hear that, all of you," added Dolan, in a high, cracked voice. "My son—my own boy, Gerald—sixteen years of age. Ha! ha! ha! You see, I laugh. My own flesh and blood—I don't mean to say that his mother would be pleased, but his father is. What you all stand committed to so stands he, too. He is my hostage. Do you trust me now?"

The crew looked in each others' faces and then one was about to speak, when, with a rush up the companion-way from the chief cabin, there came a youth whose singular beauty and intelligent aspect were in striking contrast to the gloomy and morose faces of the major portion of the crew of the cutter. Dark, waving hair blew out on the breeze in clustering masses from the fair brow and the deep hazel eyes flashed with a light that few conscious of iniquity would care to meet.

"No, no!" said the youth, "I will not. I deny it. I heard you, Captain Dolan. You speak loud, but not truly. I am no hostage of yours. I will not be what you would make me. By force I am here—by force I am here a prisoner—not a pirate!"

"Pirate!" cried Dolan—"you hear, of all you?"

A groan of anger burst from the crowd.

"He calls you pirates! Away with him! And you, Martin, is this your care of your own particular charge?"

"I locked him in the aft cabin."

"And I broke my way out," added the boy, as he held up a short-handled hatchet that had hitherto escaped observation. "I heard you, and I made my way here to deny your words and to defy your power. I will not be a pirate; I will not be a smuggler. I cannot, and I will not, father! Father! I call you by that name now, which has not passed my lips for many a day. I call you father now, and I beg of you not to care for me—not to be good to me—not to take any heed of me; but I ask you to desert me, to cast me from you, to send me where you will, so that you let me leave this vessel. I can, but did I will not join in them. Father, father! have some pity upon me."

The boy, with tears gushing from his eyes, flung himself on his knees at the feet of Dolan, who regarded him with an expression that even the most brutal of the crew shrank from. There was a quivering, malignant flash about the eyes of Dolan, and a compression of the lips, that spoke of rage, exultation and contemplated cruelty.

"Wretch!" he said, "is this your duty to your own father, who has—ha! ha!—who has brought you up so tenderly and who would yet make a man of you—and such a man, too, as your father—ha! ha—never was [illegible] you—such a man that he would fail to know you—such a man that he would see you gibbeted for piracy, and yet only at the last moment, when the roar and the execrations of the multitude that came to see the execution—only at that moment would he know you, and not then unless some one whispered or shrieked in his ears the truth. Back! back! I say; imp of evil. Avoid my vengeance! Back, I say!"

"Father, father!"

"Not a word. Why do I not kill you? Since when have you thought proper to call me father? I thought, by some freak of hate, you had left that off."

"I did leave it off when you struck Grace and she left it off. We agree—"

"Oh, you agreed, did you? Rank mutiny."

"You struck the dear child and the blood was upon her sweet face. I saw you, and from that moment—"

"Well? and from that moment?"

"I will not say it. You do not love either of us. Let us both go and we will seek our own bread, if it be from door to door; and in the time to come, father, we will yet pray for you and we will try not to think harshly of you. It may be that we shall not be able to love you, but we will never forget—never—never, that we are your children and we will not hate you; oh, no—no—no! But you know that Grace is so young and so gentle, and you know that we love each other very, very dearly. It may be, father, that you think and believe that you are acting kindly by me in bringing me here. It may be that you mean kindly and think this the only mode of life for me within your power; but, oh! think otherwise! I will be no burden to you, nor will Grace. Let us both go—let us both go hand in hand into the world together. Heaven will look down upon us and keep us, and if you let us go with only one kind word, that word shall be written in tears of grateful sympathy in both our hearts. We will yet try to love you, father—father!"

In Bunhill Fields.

[Bunyan and De Foe are buried in Bunhill fields, near London.]

Calm Bunhill! in thy bosom sleep,
Beneath the mossy stone,
A gentle pair whose names and deeds
To all the world are known.
'Tis sweet to hear the linnet sing,
To see the grasses blow,
Above the almost hidden graves
Of Bunyan and De Foe!

One eve I plucked a little flow'r,
Star-kissed from clustered dome,
And laid it on the breast of him
Who guided Christian home.
The twilight zephyrs gently stirred
The clover in the vale;
And poor blind Mary sang for me
Her songs from Bedford Jail.

And when I sought another grave,
Between a tear and smile,
I seemed to be a boy again
With Crusoe on his isle.
I blessed the book—the best of all
My boyhood's treasures few,—
And thanked the necromancer great
For all the boys I knew!

How gently sleep the honored pair!
The years that come and go
But add new lustre to the names
Of Bunyan and De Foe.
To-night the stars look softly down,
The sky its dew-drops yields,
And Love recrowns the famous dead
In quiet Bunhill fields.

Real Ability.

Those who think that industry, however assiduous, and preparation, however thorough, will produce as good results where talent is absent and tastes are averse as when they coincide err exceedingly. Nothing can give that living power, that keen insight, that warm enthusiasm, which vitalize endeavour and breathe a soul into labour but a nature attuned to and in love with the work in hand. The expression, a born artist, or poet, or teacher is not without a real meaning, though often misunderstood. It does not mean that such a one can ever rise to greatness in these directions without assiduous effort and careful preparation, but that he has within him those qualities which, if developed, may lead to heights perhaps unknown.

The Harvest Moon.

The phenomenon known as the harvest-moon is altogether independent of harvest and of terrestrial latitude and longitude. The nearest full moon to the autumnal equinox, when the sun is in Libra, is the proper harvest-moon. She then rises sooner after sun-setting than at any other period of the year, and nearly at the same time for days together, occasioning a number of brilliant moonlit nights. Then so-called hunter's moon is the immediately succeeding one as soon as the orbed moon is in full effulgence.

Paradoxical as it may seem, the less "soap" there is used the cleaner acampaign is likely to be.

A rural contemporary writes feelingly on "How to Treat an Editor." A good rule is to follow the example of Col. Crockett: Hand him the decanter and turn your back.

Mr. Joseph Arch declared at the Trades Union Congress that during the past year he had cultivated a rood of land, and had raised £9 worth of produce from it. If Mr. Arch could do this in the intervals of Parliamentary and platform work, what would he not do with a piece of land if he devoted his undivided attention to it? But Mr. Arch should impart the secret of his success to others. At this rate a labourer could make £100 a year profit from four acres, after paying all outgoings.

Relic hunters will be glad to hear of the discovery in Egypt, by Prof. Maspero, of a tomb quite untouched by the defiling and pilfering Arab, in which a square, a mason's leveller, compasses, and other tools have been found beside a mummy. The dead man was an architect, builder, and carver of inscriptions, having control of one-quarter of the cemetery at Thebes. The tomb was very comfortably furnished with linen cloths, painted jars, statuettes, and other articles of use or luxury, and contained two sledges for the transport of mummies and sarcophagi.

MARKDALE, OCT. 7. 1886,

GLENELG FALL SHOW.

The first day was fine and a large amount of grain, roots, fruit, dairy, domestic manufactures, ladies work &c., was brot to the hall and tastefully arranged by those in charge. The judging in those lines was done same day.

On Friday, the second day, the weather became most unfavorable, being cold and squally, with showers of soft snow throughout the day: notwithstanding all this, there was a good turn out, but nothing like what it would had the weather been favorable The show was in every respect a credit and a grand success, calling forth eulogies from visitors and spectators from far and near. The exhibit in the hall was large; indeed the space was quite too small to allow a proper display of the goods. Grain good was and a fine exhibit. Roots and fruit were shown in great abundance, while the quality was something remarkable. The dairy exhibit was good, and the quality fine. The ladies department was well filled with a really fine and creditable exhibit. Plants and flowers were shown in abundance, adding immensely to the appearance of the show room. The Poultry show was a grand exhibition in itself in fact it was the best we ever saw at a local or country show. Fine horses were shown in various classes far surpassing Fairs of more pretentious expositions. There were some really fine pedigree cattle, showing that a lively interest is taken in the improvement of stock. Sheep and swine was not so largely represented. Carriages and Implements were also an attractive feature. We have already trespassed on our allotted space even without giving due credit to deserving ones.

Holland Centre.

From our own Correspondent.

Miss Deavitt of Manitoba is visiting friends in this part.

Born.—The wife of Mr. John Watson, of a son, still born.

Married.—Mr. John Murray of Arnott, to Miss Mary Stewart of Holland. May their happiness be great, and their troubles, little ones.

Our last cattle fair was a good one, but we expect the next one to be the best of the season.

Edward Sargent's shingle factory was destroyed by fire on the night of the 23rd ult. We understand it was insured for $950.

The Chatsworth correspondent to the O. S. Advertiser evidently feels much grieved because the Holland Council gave the Holland Centre fall show a grant of $15, while granting but $10 to Holland Agricultural Society. He forgets that Holland Centre is in the centre of the township and thus in a position to accommodate a much greater number of Holland ratepayers that a show held at the boundry of the township. If 25 dollars is the whole amount to be granted to those institutions by the corporation, then $6.25, or one quarter, would be a fair proportion for Chatsworth Show to receive. As to our Society being an illegal concern, as intimated by our Chatsworth neighbor, it is amusing to hear a sane man express himself thus. When Holland Centre Ag. Society was organized, a great majority of the township ratepayers were satisfied that the centre of the township was the proper place for the township show. $150 was then subscribed and offered to the Tp. Ag. Society on conditions that the show would be held at Holland Centre; this offer was rejected, after which our enterprising citizens and neighbors decided to have an independent one, which has been a success, at least they have been able to pay their prizes in full, and that without the assistance of a government grant. Last year our society offered to amalgamate on conditions that the show would be held alternately in Chatsworth and Holland Centre, but they again declined, which only makes us all the more determined to go on and succeed.

Holland Council.

Holland Centre, Oct. 4, 1886.

Council of the Township of Holland met on the above date for the transaction of business: Members all present; Reeve in the chair. Williscroft, Harvey, That we accept the proposition of the clerk to settle the matter of Alex Lyons for the sum of $15.00. Moved and seconded that by-law No. 6, for the remodeling of U. S. S. between Holland and Sullivan' and also by-law No. 8 for appointing collectors to read first second line and engrossed on the minutes.

A communication was read from Thos. Gordon in reference to by-law of U. S. S. No. 2 Holland and Euphrasia, also his &c., for arbitrator in the above matter.

Galbraith, Harvey, that the council are ready and willing to pass by-law refered to in Mr. Gordon's letter at any time the expences incurred and paid by the petitioners in accordance with sect. 72 on the Consolidated School Act of 1885.

Galbraith, Harvey, that we adjourn till the tenth day of November.

Rattle Snake Killed

One evening recently near St. Mary's, a lady was out for a stroll, and suddenly came on a huge rattle snake by the roadside. She withdrew haistily and gave the alarm to the family, five or six boys and a quarter dozen of girls with the old gentleman, who all surrounded the reptile, armed to the teeth with pitchforks, axes and pieces of rails. They were immediately re-inforced by a large family who lives opposite, which strengthened their courage, but still the excitement ran high. One of the crowd, a strong and brave young man, thought of his double-barrel gun, hastened for it, crept cautiously as near the monster as he thought safe, took careful and deliberate aim, off she went; the monster gave one bound and fell apparently lifeless. One of the brave party ventured near enough to reach it with a ten foot pole, while the crowd held their position a safe distance back ready for an encounter, as they strongly suspected the wiley and deadly reptile might be only waiting quietly to have revenge. This brave however found that the shot had proved fatal, but to their great dismay and chagrin it was a large girth which had fallen off a breachy horse.

THE FALL CAMPAIGN.

The Fall season brings with it many necessities which cannot and will not be neglected. Resolution of Condolence.

The following resolution was passed recently on the occasion of the sad death by drowning of Mr. Norton's son on the 12th July last at Walter's Falls.

Walter's Falls, Aug. 4, 1886.

Dear Brother Norton,—The brothers of Cascade Lodge, C. O. O. F., hereby tenders to you and your wife and family, their sincere sympathy in the sad bereavement which has so recently fallen on you and them by the death of your beloved son. Death is sad in any form, but comming in such a sudden manner adds to the bitterness. Yet there is a bright beyond to which your son has gone a short time before you, where he waits the coming of his friends who will join him at last, making a full happy family around that Throne where parting is forever over. In offering you your condolence we trust you feel it isfrom our inmost, hearts, for you having thefullest sympathy from the whole vicinity, how much more must we, your intimate friends and brothers feel for you, knowing the loveyou bore for your son. Friend and companion, yous is a severe blow, but it was God who struck it, and there is mercy in it if we could only lift the veil and get a glimpse into his eternal rest provided for all of us if we are only faithful unto death. As the Psalmist cried in his lamentations over his son, "He cannot come to me but I can go to him," so although you cannot bring back your son, you can go to him. Even though you cannot forget your boy, and all efforts at consoling seem a vain attempt. still in the Divinity ordained that time will mitigate all griefs and heal over all wounds. Again we ask you to accept our truest sympathy, and trust you will trust Him who alone can comfort you in distress.

Yours in brotherly love.

(Signed in behalf of the Lodge,)

AN OCEAN MYSTERY.

A TRUE STORY.

Though it is nearly twenty years ago since the events related below occurred, yet the impression left my upon mind has never faded or lost the vividness of its outlines; and though there is nothing really explicable about it, yet the dash of mystery connected with it has always marked it in my memory as an incident of an unusual order.

We were driving on our way northwards from the gloomy and savage neighborhood of Cape Horn, homeward bound in Her Majesty's frigate the dear old Benwaterer, now, alas, long since consigned to the ship-breaker. The fact of our being homeward-bound should have made all hearts light and all faces bright among our five hundred souls; but for all that, there was a general air of gloom in the ship, which was not to be accounted for save by one theory only—that of superstition. For things had not gone well with us since we had hoisted our homeward-bound pennant. True, we had sailed out of Valparaiso Bay with the said pendant streaming away, and with all our "chummy ships" playing "should Auld acquaintance be forgot?" as we passed by them; and we had received and returned cheer upon cheer as we made our way to the open sea; while from the midshipmen's berth had rolled up in a rich volume of sound, every night for more than a week before, the old strain so well known and so lovingly cherished in Her Majesty's service:

> And when we arrive at Plymouth Docks,
> The pretty little girls come round in flocks,
> And one to the other they do say;
> "Oh, here comes Jack with his three years' pay;
> For I see he's homeward bou-ou-ound,
> For I see he's homeward bound."

But still, as I say, things had not gone well with us. We had speedily left the warmth of the tropical weather, and had gradually found it colder and colder each morning as we made our way down south towards the dreaded Cape of Storms. That was natural and we were prepared for it; but no sooner had we got to the latitude of the Cape itself, than the wind had shifted, and we had it day after day, night after night, a hard gale right in our teeth. Bitter cold it was too, with tearing storms of snow and hail—heavy thundering seas sweeping us fore and aft, bursting in on our weather-bow, and covering us with spray, that froze ere it fell upon our decks. Up aloft, everything frozen hard—running rigging as stiff and unmanageable as a steel hawser; blocks jammed with ice and snow; canvas as unyielding as a board; men up aloft for an hour or more trying to take a reef in the fore-topsail, and then so stiffened with cold themselves, as to be unable to come down without assistance; while below, the close, musty, damp, dark ship was the picture of discomfort, her decks, main and lower, always wet, often with an inch or two of ice-cold water washing about on them; soaking clothes hung up all over the place, in the wild hope that they might eventually get dry; ports and scuttles tight shut to keep out the seas that thundered ceaselessly at them as the ship plunged and wallowed in the angry element; no fires allowed anywhere except at the cook's galley, which was always fully occupied; and no warmth to be obtained anywhere except in your hammock, and even this, in most cases, what with faulty stowage and leaky decks, was wet through.

Day after day, night after night, this state of things kept on, until their gradually crept in among the men—started, no doubt, by the older hands, always and deeply imbued with the spirit of superstition—a sort of dim suspicion that the ship was under a ban—bewitched, in fact; that, as they said, there was a Jonah aboard; and until he went overboard, we should never weather the dreaded Cape, but were doomed to thrash continually to windward, never gaining an inch on our way. Strange as it may seem, there were many, very many, among our blue-jackets who held this belief firmly, and expressed it openly. We, of course, in the midshipmen's berth, careless and light-hearted from our extreme youth, laughed at the solemn tones of the old quartermasters, who employed their hours of midnight watch on deck in narrating to us similar instances of vessels which had been thus doomed to struggle with the storm, till some unknown criminal had either confessed his crime, or had voluntarily paid the penalty of it. But, as the bad weather continued, and the ship seemed quite unable to advance upon her homeward track, some of us, too, began to allow our minds to be influenced to a certain degree by the mysterious language and ominous hints of these men, so much our elders in years, and our superiors in practical experience.

Matters had got to this pitch, and no change appeared about to take place in the aspect of the weather or the direction of the wind, when one wild and wretched forenoon at seven bells (eleven-thirty) the men were piped to muster on the main-deck for that one drop of comfort which they could look forward to in the day—the serving out of each man's "tot" of grog. Faces which at other times wore a look of gloom, were brightening under the influence of the spirit; the ever-present growl was stilled for a while; the joke began to pass around as the blood warmed and flowed more rapidly through the veins, when a whisper—a sort of muttered suggestion, made at first with a kind of apologetic reluctance, but with growing confidence and insistence as it gained ground—passed through the throng of men that one of their number was missing. Such a whisper makes its way through a ship's company, however large, like a current of electricity, and so it was in this case; but at first the men kept it to themselves. It could not long, however, be concealed; and presently it spread to the midshipmen's berth; next, the wardroom heard it; and soon the captain himself was made aware of the suspicion. Well I remember, how as we sat in the cold, damp, comfortless, dirty berth, discussing the matter with boyish eagerness, the sudden shrill pipe of the boatswain's mate burst upon our ears, followed by the hoarse cry of: "Hands muster by open list!" So, then, the captain thought it important enough to make serious and official inquiry into it. Then came the calling over of those five hundred names, with most of which we had been familiar for three years or more of our commission in the Pacific. But I am wrong—not quite all of those five hundred. There came a time when the name of one, a petty officer, was called; but no reply came to the call, and a dead silence reigned over the ship—silence, I mean, as regards human speech or sound; the gale and the thundering seas never for a moment ceased their tumult. Then followed the grave and searching investigation into the mystery. Who had seen him last? Where was he then? In what watch? How long ago was it? and so on, and so on, until at last the whole ship's company knew that one of their number had gone overboard—presumably in the morning watch; probably swept off by a peculiarly heavy sea, well remembered in that watch. But unknown, unheard, unseen—his cry for help, if such a cry he gave, utterly drowned and smothered in the ceaseless roar of the sea, the shriek of the wind. And so the men were dismissed, each to his special duty; and the paymaster was directed to see that the fatal letters D. D. (Discharged dead) were placed against the unhappy man's name in the ship's books.

And now occurred a circumstance which took the whole ship by storm, as it were, and which, mere accident and coincidence as it was, made all the old seadogs nod their heads and eye the younger men meaningly, as who would say, "What did I tell you?" while they, on their part, were firmly impressed with the lesson in cause and effect thus so pointedly placed before them. It was close upon noon when the fact of a man being lost was clearly established; and ere the afternoon watch was over, the sky had cleared, the storm had dropped, the wind had shifted right around, and was now blowing dead fair! There was no room for more argument—the oldsters had it all their own way; the scoffers were silenced.

The ship now, in a few hours, rounded the Cape, which before had seemed an impossible obstruction to her, and made her way unhindered to the north; but the feelings engendered by the events immediately preceding this change had taken too strong a hold upon the men to pass lightly away, and in many a long first or middle watch the subject of the disappearance of the lost shipmate and its immediate effect upon the elements was discussed with bated breath, and many an ominous shake of the head was given as the opinion was moodily expressed that "We'd not done with him yet." And when, a few days afterwards, on a Sunday morning during divine service, the quartermaster of the watch came creeping and tip-toeing down the ladder to report something to the commander, who at once followed him silently up the after-hatchway, but a few minutes afterwards returned and whispered mysteriously to the captain, who in his turn mounted on deck and did not come down again, we all felt that something more might be in store for us, and was even now perchance at hand. How impatiently we sat as the sermon dragged out its seemingly interminable length, and then, when at last the blessing had been given and the quick sharp voice of the first-lieutenant had issued the order, "Boatswain's mate, pipe down!" we literally tumbled up on the deck, to learn what it was that had disturbed the calm of that Sabbath forenoon. It needed but a glance. "Icebergs!" There they were, a long array of cold, filmy, shadowy giants, looming huge in the mist with which each surrounded himself—ghostly, ghastly, clammy spectres from the very land of Death itself. Not that we thought of them then as such; no, we were glad, we youngters; we liked them: we said they were "jolly," though any object less gifted with an aspect of joviality one can hardly imagine. Each, as we neared it, wrapped us in its clammy shroud of death-cold fog, and chilled us to the very marrow, and, towering far above our mainroyal-mast head, seemed to threaten us with instant and appalling destruction.

So we sped on, iceberg after iceberg rising above the horizon as we held our course; and, if sources of anxiety and alarm by day, how much more so by night! Often we entered a vast bank of impenetrable fog, conscious that somewhere, in its inmost recesses, lay concealed, as if waiting for its prey, a gigantic berg, but never knowing from moment to moment when or where exactly to expect it. This was a spleudid chance for croakers. Many a great solemn head was shaken, and many a jaw wagged with gloomy forbodings over that unusual and unexpected appearance of ice in the Southern Sea. By-and-bye the wind began to freshen, and again of another fair gale appeared, though this time from a quarter fairly favourable to us; and with her canvas snugged down and a bright lookout forward, the old ship began to shake her sides as she hurried away from those inhospitable seas with their spectral occupants towards the inviting warmth of the tropics and the steady blast of the trade-winds.

Anxious for a breath of fresh air before turning in to my half-sodden hammock, I went on deck to take a turn with a chum, and enjoy, as we often did together, a few anticipations of the delights of home once more. It was a wild—a very wild night. There was a small moon; but the clouds were hurrying over her face in ragged streamers, and in such constant succession, that her light was seldom visible; and when she did show it for a fleeting moment, it fell upon a black, tossing, angry sea, whose waves broke into clouds of icy foam as they fell baffled off the bow of the great ship, or tried to leap savagely over her quarter. It was a hard steady gale, the wind shrieking and humming through the rigging, and the old ship herself pounding and [illegible] at the great mountains of water before her, and creaking, groaning, and complaining as she did so, masts, yards, hull, all in one strident concert together, as if remonstrating at the labour which she was forced to undergo. In spite of the moon, the night was black as Erebus, and from the quarter-deck on which we paced, the bow of the ship was barely visible. We [illegible] our faces aft, my chum and I in our [illegible]-deck walk, when a voice [illegible] clear, and [illegible] starboard [illegible] the starboard [illegible] every [illegible] deck [illegible] in that direction. Not a vestige of a light was to be seen! Then the voice of the officer of the watch was heard from the bridge, ordering the midshipman of the watch to go forward and find out if the man was dreaming, or if any one else had seen it; but the man stuck to his text. He had seen for a second time a bright light on the starboard bow—a very bright light, quite different from anything which was usually seen at sea.

"No, sir! I beg your pardon, sir! I [illegible] sir! I [illegible] awake I am not, sir! and able to swear to it."

By this time all hands were on the alert, and many officers, old and young, had tumbled up from below at the hail.

"But, my good man, if it was really a light which you saw, some one else must have noticed it too."

"Don't know nothin' about that, sir; but I can swear to it. What I seen were were"——

"A bright light on the starboard beam!" sang out the starboard waist lookout at this moment, and "I saw it!" and "I saw it!" echoed several voices; but before the officer the watch could turn round towards the direction indicated, it was gone and the starboard beam presented one uniform sheet of impenetrable blackness.

"Waist there! What was it like?"

"Somethin' of a flash-light, I should say, sir," replied the lookout. "Very bright and very short—gone in a moment-like."

By this time the captain and commander were both on the bridge, and the whole ship was alive with curiosity.

"What can it be?" I asked of the old boatswain against whom I brushed in the darkness as I walked aft.

"'Tis a boat," said he; "that's what it must be. The cap'n he allows it's a boat, and he's pretty sure to be right. Some poor souls whose vessel has foundered among the ice—whalers, most likely—took to the boats, they have. I saw that there light myself—seemed very close to the water, it did. They seen our lights, and burnt a flash-light. If they got another, they'll show that, too, presently."

And now the voice of the commander rang out: "Mr. Sights!"

"Ay, ay, sir," replied the gunner.

"Clear away your two foremost guns on the maindeck, and fire blank charges at short intervals; and get some blue lights, and show them in the fore-rigging at once!"

"Ay, ay, sir." And away went the gunner to see his orders carried out instantly.

But ere his head had disappeared down the hatchway—"A bright light on the starboard quarter!" roared out the marine sentry at the lifebuoy right aft; and once more everybody turned sharp round to find nothing to gaze at but the universal darkness.

"Hands, about ship!" was now the order; and in quick succession came from the bridge and well-known commands in the sharp, imperative voice of the lieutenant of the watch: "Ease down the helm!"—"Helm's a lee!"—"Raise tacks and sheets!" &c. And as the splendid old ship answered her helm like a boat, and began to fill on the other tack, "Maintopsail haul!"—for our courses were furled—"Head braces!" "Off all, haul!" and we were on the other tack.

The ship was now brilliantly illuminated by half-a-dozen blue lights burnt in her fore and main rigging; while, as we began to move ahead once more, our bow guns blazed forth from the maindeck one after the other—a roar which we fondly imagined would be more welcome than the most delicious music to the ears of the poor storm-tossed castaways in that frail boat which we now hoped to rescue from the wrath of the raging sea. At intervals there appeared again the bright but transient flash which had first attracted our notice; and through the roar of the waves and the shriek of the wind, we at times imagined that we could hear human voices shouting no doubt for help, and all eyes were strained to the uttermost through the blackness to try and discern the first glimpse of the boat itself. The last flash had told us that we were steering directly for it, and on we sped, our blue lights hissing and flaring in our rigging, our guns ceaselessly roaring out our sympathy and our desire to save.

"Keep a sharp lookout forward there!"—"Lifeboat's crew, fall in aft!" and we prepared to lower the port quarter-boat, which was told off as a "lifeboat"—that is, for any purposes of rescue, although the state of the sea was anything but favourable for boat-duty; but when we thought of that poor boat tossing about on the storm-vexed sea with its freight of shivering and half-drowned men, ay, and maybe a woman or two among them, and then remembered the frowning icebergs and the fearful dangers which they represented, no man hesitated, and had volunteers been called for to man the lifeboat, the whole ship's company would have come forward. Well can I remember the almost choking feeling of thankfulness in my own heart when I thought of the wild joy of these poor outcasts at the prospect of so speedy a rescue, and anticipated the delight of welcoming them on the quarter-deck of so staunch and safe a ship. But all in a moment my anticipations and my sentiments of gratitude were scattered to the winds.

"Keep her away, sir! keep her away!" came a roar from the forecastle. "You'll be right down upon her!" A large full-rigged ship right ahead of us!"

Up went our helm, and the ship's head paid off; and as we strained our eyes in the direction indicated, we could dimly make out, to our intense surprise and unspeakable wonder, the huge, shadowy, ghostly outline of an unusually large vessel. No signs of life appeared about her. The light which had first attracted our notice was now no longer to be seen. Her masts, yards, and sails were only just visible—not as a black hard shadow against the sky, but pale, spectral, as if mere vapour—barely to be discernable, yet leaving no room for doubt. There she sailed, a veritable phantom ship. All hands gazed at her in silence. The blue lights were allowed to burn out, and no fresh ones were lighted. The great guns ceased to thunder on the maindeck. The lifeboat's crew muttered uneasily among themselves, as if dreading the possibility of being ordered to board so uncanny a craft; while the older hands once more shook their heads, and said "they knowed we hadn't seen the last of that poor feller as fell overboard.

But there was nothing more for us to do. Who and what the mysterious stranger hanging on our port quarter was we could not possibly ascertain on such a night, in such a gale; and, at length the order was given to "Wear ship," and we once more turned our back on the vessel which we had been so eagerly pursuing for more than an hour. As we did so, we could see he too altered his course; his spectral yards, with their shadowy sails, swung round, and he disappeared without a sign in the darkness of the night.

"Don't tell me," said the boatswain, "as that there were a real ship. Didn't that poor feller disappear suddenly just before we sighted her? Answer me that! Well, then—did we ever know what became of him since? Answer me that! Well, then! That there phantom ship was to tell us as how he was drownded, that's what that were, and nobody [illegible] no other than that.—How do I explain them bright lights? Answer me this: Were them lights ornery lights, such as a ship shows at night?—No; of course they weren't. Corpse lights!—that's my answer; and when I says corpse-lights, I means it."

It may have been an honest merchantman, outward-bound, and too intent upon making a speedy voyage to "speak" us, but nevertheless, the boatswain's opinion was pretty generally accepted as the correct solution of what was considered to be an ocean mystery.

Meteoric Terrors.

In trying to interest you in this subject, so remote from the studies of most of you, I rely upon your sense of the unity of all science, and at the same time upon the strong hold which these weird bodies have ever had upon the imaginations of men. In ancient times temples were built over the meteorite images that fell down from Jupiter, and divine worship was paid them, and in these latter days a meteorite stone that fell last year in India became the object of daily anointings and other ceremonial worship. In the fearful imagery of the Apocalypse the terrors are deepened by there falling "from heaven a great star burning as a torch," and by the stars of heaven falling "unto the earth as a fig-tree casteth her unripe figs when she is shaken of a great wind." The "great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his head seven diadems" is presented in the form of a huge fire-ball. "His tail draweth the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth." Records of these feared visitors, under the name of flying dragons, are found all through the pages of the monkish chroniclers of the middle ages. The Chinese appointed officers to record the passage of meteors and comets, for they were thought to have somewhat to say to the weal or woe of rulers and people.

By gaining in these later days a sure place in science, these bodies have lost their terrors, but so much of our knowledge about them is fragmentary, and there is still so much that is mysterious, that men have loved to speculate about their origin, their functions, and their relations to other bodies in the solar system. It has been easy, and quite common, too, to make these bodies the cause of all kinds of things for which other causes could not be found.

They came from the moon; they came from the earth's volcanoes; they came from the sun; they came from Jupiter and the other planets; they came from the comets; they came from the nebulous mass from which the solar system has grown; they came from the fixed stars; they came from the depths of space. They supply the sun with his radiant energy; they give the moon her accelerated motion; they break in pieces heavenly bodies; they threw up the mountains on the moon; they made large gifts to our geologic strata; they cause the auroras; they give regular and irregular changes to our weather. A comparative geology has been built up from the relations of the earth's rocks to the meteorites; a large list of new animal forms has been named from their concretions; and the possible introduction of life to our planet has been credited to them. They are satellites of the earth; they travel in streams, and in groups, and in isolated orbits about the sun; they travel in groups and singly through stellar spaces; it is they that reflect the zodiacal light; they constitute the tails of comets; the solar corona is due to them; the long coronal rays are meteor-streams seen edgewise.

On His Holidays.

"Very interesting scenery, sir," observed a dapper, loudly-dressed Cockney tourist to a hard-featured, grim-looking Scot on board the Loch Katrine steamer. "Im pleased ye think sae," answered Sawney. "Replete with 'istorical hassociations." "Maybe, but I dinna ken onything aboot them." "What!" exclaimed the Englishman, "surely, sir, you 'ave read the works of your great countryman, Sir Walter Scott, the 'Wizard of the North' you know." "Never even heard o' him. Wha was he?" "Sir, that is perfectly hincredible; you a Scotchman, and never 'eard of the man who wrote the Waverly Novels, Marmion, the Lady of the Lake, and all that sort of thing?" "Never in my life." The disgusted Cockney turned away with a muttered expression of contempt at such atrocious ignorance, and an individual who overheard the colloquy, blushed for his uninformed compatriot, and took an opportunity of asking whether his confession was actually true. "Toot, man," was the testy reply. "I didna want to hear any o' that English idiot's sentimental bletherin'. Heard o' Walty Scott! For the last twelve months I've had enough of Sir Walter Scott, and his novels too. I'm a printer's reader, and oor firm have been printin' a new edition o' his works. I'm on my holidays, man, and canna be bathered speakin' aboot shop!"

Youth.

We ought, in justice to youth, to lead it to expect pleasure in the actual performance of its labours, to taste the delights of excellence, to revel in the exercise of climbing, to feel enthusiasm in conquering difficulties. Youth is especially alive to these influences, and might easily be led to welcome them; but, when we coldly ignore them, and urge industry and effort only for the sake of what may afterwards accrue, when we assume that work is hard and uninteresting, and exhort its performance as a painful duty or a dire necessity, we cannot wonder if they take us at our word and avoid as much of it as possible.

A Considerate Bride.

Caller—"I am so glad to see you looking happy. Your wedding tour was not of long duration, I notice. Very sensible, very sensible."

Bride—"My husband was perfectly willing to prolong the tour; but I knew that his presence was required at his place of business."

Caller—"Very few brides are so considerate as that."

Bride—"Oh, I ceased to be a bride very early! In less than a week I became a wife."

Caller—"I do not understand."

Bride—"We had not been married a week before he asked me to sew on a button."

The Dark Valley—A Tale.

A certain man was travelling in a far country, and along with him were three companions whose company did much beguile the way, and one besides was very dear to him. Now it came to pass that at the end of his journey was a dark and dismal valley, at sight of which he was sorely troubling and afraid, saying, "Who will go with me through this dark valley; for I cannot go alone?" Then one of the three companions said, "Farewell, I must now leave thee, for neither can I linger a moment longer." The other said, "I will go with thee to the entrance of the valley, but further than that I cannot go." And the third said, "I will not only speak well of thee to all my friends, but thou hast entered the dark valley; therefore I will put the trumpet to my lips and proclaim thy name abroad for many years to come."

Then did the traveler turn to his dear friend who was nearest and dearest to him, and said, "Come thou with me, and only thou shalt even enter this valley without fear." And the friend said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

Hear now the interpretation of the parable. The three companions are Power, Wealth, and Fame. The first forsakes the soul so soon as it comes in sight of the valley; the second continues to administer many comforts up to the last moment of the dying man; but though there be millions of mourners up at the entrance of the death-valley, not one penny has ever been carried into the shadowy vale. The third companion is Fame, which writes epitaphs on tombstones, sings of departed greatness, "waking the living lyre," after the soul has left the body.

But the faithful friend is called Love, though some there be who call her by the sweet name of Love; because she comes from the bosom of God and doth represent the love to man. This is a friend indeed, for she will not forsake the soul that cometh to her, even in eternity; for there she will plead his cause before the immaculate Lamb, and her plea shall prevail. Let every one then that hath a soul secure the favour of this faithful friend!

Fickleness.

Wherever there is fickleness you may with truth to him who is characterised "Thou shalt not excel." The man continually changing his occupation, constantly moving from one situation to another, fails to better himself in any and lives only to illustrate the proverb the "rolling-stone." The ancients saying, "Beware of the man of one by which they marked their appreciation the quality of persistence, and affirmed he who has mastered one subject thoroughly is always a more formidable antagonist than your scholar who so overloads his brain the production of others that it is impossible for him to exercise the power of thinking. Daily we see that he who "focussed" himself upon some one is pushed into the front, while those spread themselves over many, or give selves now to one thing and now to are rarely heard of among men. always changing from object to ishes nothing, and his life at last a heap of detached stones, which, but kept to one plan, might have been into a stately and commodious abode.

Ignorance.

Probably there is no quality more in dispelling ignorance than the which dares to confess it. The child fast, chiefly because he has no self- fear of being thought uninformed. all manner of questions without any of misgiving, and exposes his own cies without any feeling of shame or It is by his free and eager inquiries improves so rapidly. Were he show his ignorance, no one could out of it. The enforced school-lessons comprise nearly the whole of his and even they could not be adapted individual mental needs. As it is, genial and kind-hearted person with he comes in contact is interested to his stock of knowledge. The same ilege might be enjoyed by the adult a feeling of shame prevent him from knowledge in the same natural and way. But, as the years pass, he feel that the confession of ignorance pose him to ridicule, or contempt, or sure, and he therefore hides it under ever pretext he can find.

Actions and Words.

We should judge men by their actions rather than by their theories. actions are the best interpreters of thoughts and feelings. Comparatively men are able to express in words fully justly the state of their hearts; but man can act in harmony with his feelings he will. Men frequently act hypocritically it is true. They find it easier however bend their speech into deceptive forms to bend their actions thus. Hence, there is a disposition to deceive, a actions are not so apt to be fully at with his real feelings as his words are.

Home.

Home is sometimes thought flat and and too often made so, just for the recognising what it stands for. The of life that go to form the household are source not only of life's richest joys and sacred memories, but also of some of the best and noblest characteristics of man. love, the fidelity, the forbearance, the sacrifice that are nourished by family life among the richest possessions of humanity. Such life can never become wearisome common-place, save to those who fail to comprehend its meaning or refuse to act in harmony with it.

Devotion.

BY JOHN M. CAMPBELL.

Just as the hill-crowned lake reflects the sky
That o'er it bends—shines blue when it is blue,
Is gray when dim and hoary clouds float by,
And bright when sunset flames a gorgeous hue;
The tapestries of eve with crimson dye,
And gleams when night's soft dusky hands renew
The heaven's star-studded diadem on high,
Whose million jewels glisten clear and true;

So is reflected in a maiden's eye,
Through lashes long or drooping eyelids shy,
Each changing mood of him whom she loves best—
Whether in sorrow dim or gladness bright,
Love shines with constant and elevated light
Through her soul's windows, ever unobscured

The Old House Near The Orchard.

was a queer little place where I was and where my childish years were pass-till I was old enough to send away to
. There were saw mills and car shops piles of boards and lumber, and great s, which always seemed so grand to me, they were designed for the vessels, the s that went over the blue sea and brought all our stores. But I will tell about ships another time. They were dear to , and to this day nothing thrills me more the sight of a ship under full sail.
ere were but few farms near us and the ool house was built close to the one that the old house and the orchard. My in school commanded a view of both and was indeed a pleasant picture to look upon.
e house, with its gray roof and pretty mneys half hidden by the great spreading ple trees, the long stretch of green field ween it and the road winding away, for ght I then knew, to the farthest bounds of universe. It never lost its charm for me, ough I often went through both orchard
d house. One day I went with my mother.
e mistress met us at the door. She look-careworn and distressed. I wondered how could feel so in a place so pleasant, with e glad sunshine all around; the orchard
m with young apples dancing in the light eze, and the room she took us into (the st room, thanks to "Prue Palmleaf" for aging it to my mind) so bright and cheerful and so scrupulously neat, with its unpainted floor scrubbed till it resembled white velvet and no carpet ever looked so fine to me as the many hued braided mat that covered the centre of that room. There was a painted dresser with brass handles on the drawers and cupboard doors, whose shelves contained the best dishes; a tea set of white china with little sprigs of pink scattered over them; a set of larger cups and saucers, tea color and white, pitchers the upper and lower parts of some shining substance and middle of something that looked like granite. I think the knowledge of their make must be among the lost arts, for I have looked in vain for their like for the last ten years. But I must tell you why the lady of the house was so sad. Her daughter Irene was to be married and go away to Ontario to live. If you wish I will tell you more of Irene at some future time, for she was a lovely maiden, the pride and joy of the old home near the orchard.

Prince Bismarck's literary tastes are untrammelled by conventionalities. He is said to be equally fond of reading the Bible and the latest bad French novel.

A green crescent moon, of a most brilliant yet delicate shade, was seen recently in New Zealand. The phenomenon was visible for only a quarter of an hour.

Several East Kent sportsmen report the losing of their dogs through the great heat while partridge shooting lately. In each instance apoplexy is described as the cause of death.

At the seventeenth anniversary meeting of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars in Glasgow there was a procession four miles long through the principal streets.

Escaped prisoners from Khartoum state that the city is not destroyed. All the good houses are left standing. The Catholic Church and gardens and General Gordon's Palace are strongly fortified.

The Jewish population of Jerusalem is constantly increasing, and now numbers 18,000, This is the largest number that has lived in the sacred city at one time since the destruction by Titus in 70 A. D.

From the accounts recently published it appears that it cost £5,757 to make Prince Albert Victor a freeman of the city of London. The breakfast bill was £920, and the expenses of the committee £105. The refreshments of the Guards of Honor cost £50.

Thomas Baily Aldrich, who has just returned from a three months' trip through the interior of Russia, says that the civilization of Moscow reminded him of some wild Indian chief who in his old age puts on a pair of epaulettes or a high hat. "It simply emphasizes savagery."

A correspondent in Rome says that a particularly graceful Carrara marble statuette of an infant Bacchus has been found near ancient Subra. The legs are gone, and one hand and one arm. A goatskin hangs from the shoulders, and the head is crowned with an ivy wreath, tied with long ribbons.

The yacht propelled by electricity which crossed the English channel and returned, a distance of fifty miles, in eight hours, the other day, made the passage so noiselessly that a sea gull asleep on the water was caught before it awoke, by people on the yacht.

The execution of the public executioner is the rare spectacle which will soon be witnessed in Greece, where Bekiaris, the executioner of the Empire, murdered his mistress. An inmate of the prison of Corfu has been appointed to succeed Bekiaris, and will probably begin his public career by the execution of his predecessor.

A great fire lately broke out at Stanley Pool on the Congo, by which the whole of the Arthington Baptist Mission Station was destroyed, and a loss of property to the extent of $15,000 incurred. Large shipments are already made of stores and supplies, and an appeal for help to sustain the Mission has been made and is being liberally responded to.

There is one place in the world where the tenants have proved more than a match for their landlords. A Paris landlord recently committed suicide because his tenants refused to pay their rents. He said:—"I screwed a little money out of them by removing their doors and windows, but when the abnormally hot weather began even that proved useless." He asphyxiated himself.

In the canton of Zurich in Switzerland there is a law which requires the proprietors of land to catch two quarts of cockchafers every third year, when they are supposed to appear. If any proprietor fails to respond he is fined quite heavily. It was officially announced that 1886 was the cockchafer year. The proprietors are in despair, for cockchafers have not put in an appearance, but the law is imperative.

Paris has a new institution that is popular. It is an establishment on a main boulevard where, by paying half a franc (10 cents), one can wash his hands, have his boots blacked, his coat brushed, write letters, read all the leading Continental and English newspapers, consult a reference library, and use a telephone. New York's many hotels render such an establishment unnecessary here.

The Moon's Influence

Upon the weather is accepted by some as real, by others it is disputed. The moon never attracts corns from the tender, aching spot. Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor removes the most painful corns in three days. This great remedy makes no sore spots, doesn't go fooling around a man's foot, but gets to business at once, and effects a cure. Don't be imposed upon by substitutes and imitations. Get "Putnam's" and no other.

Germany's Pigeon Stations in France.

A singular story appears in one of the French military papers, and if the details are correct it is not surprising that the incidents should have excited something like a sensation at the French War Office. It is stated that a gentleman at Nevers, the other day, shot a pigeon, and found its wings stamped with the imperial arms of Germany, while attached to them was a quill with a cipher dispatch. The pigeon and dispatch were, it is said, sent to the French war Office, and inquiries being made, appear to confirm the belief that the Germans have established pigeon stations on French territory, and that messages are even now exchanged between these stations and the military staff at Berlin. Should these statements prove true they may well cause both uneasiness and anger in France. It is a very strong step to organize pigeon stations, with a view to invasion, in a country with which peaceful relations prevail. It is certain that this system was, previous to the war of 1871, carried on in France by German officers to an extraordinary extent, and that the invading army was far better acquainted with every road and byway and with every particular of the country than were the defenders, but this establishment of pigeon posts in a friendly country for the purpose of giving assistance to an invading army would certainly seem to be an indefensible step, and one which the French have a right to resent.

"Blood Will Tell."

Yes, the old adage is right, but if the liver is disordered and the blood becomes thereby corrupted, the bad "blood will tell's in diseases of the skin and throat, in tumors and ulcers, and in tubercles in the throat and lungs (first stages of consumption) even although the subject be descended in a straight line from Richard Cœur de Lion, or the noblest Roman of them all. For setting the liver in order no other medicine in the world equals Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery." Try it, and your "blood will tell" the story of its wonderful efficacy.

The great reputation of Briggs' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves.

Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Electric Oil," Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgias Sprains and Bruises, complaints arrising from Cold, such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

A NOVELTY.—The Young Peoples' Society of the Methodist church will give a grand entertainment in the Roller Rink on Wednesday evening next, consisting of Dialogues. Tableaux, Pantomime, Charades, Whistling Chorus, and a grand Orchestra. The young people are full of enthusiasm and are determined to surpass all former efforts. 8 o'clock sharp. Admission 25 cents; children 15. Come.

THE MANIA.—With the lowering of the franchise, there seems to be a corresponding craze for parliamentary honors: especially amongst that class whose mental incapacity especially unfits them to become rulers; while unfit to rule themselves, personally. The government of a newspaper is a small kingdom in its way; and he who cannot respectably wield the majestic quill exhibits his total unfitness to draw the reins over the steeds who pull the chariot of State.

CHURCH CONSECRATION.—A large and intelligent congregation assembled at Christ Church in this village on Tuesday evening to take part in and to witness the service of church consecration. His Lordship, Bishop Baldwin, of Huron Diocese, performed the rite of consecration. He was supported by the Rev. Cannon Mulholland, Revs. Mr. Channer, Mr. Moore, Mr. Fairlie, Mr. Farthing, and the Incumbent, Rev. Jas. Ward. It is indeed a beautiful and solemn service. This concluded, the regular evening church service was proceeded with, the Bishop and each of the clergy taking alternate parts. His Lordship preached an eloquent, lucid and most impressive sermon from the 19th verse of the 2nd chapter St. Paul's second Epistle to Timothy. The church presented a very handsome appearance, being tastefully decorated with evergreens, fruits, flowers, grain, beautiful banners and bannerets bearing appropriate texts of scripture. The final payment on the church was made last spring. The Incumbent and his congregation deserve credit for the energetic and successful manner in which they have wrought to clear their church from debt.

CLIPPINGS.

In the Chatsworth correspondents' report in the O. S. Advertiser, of their concert on the evening of the Fall Show, he says "But undoubtedly the soul of the concert was the Scotch singing by Mr. J. R. Anderson, of Markdale, and the comic singing in character by Mr. W. J. Benson, of the same place. Mr. Anderson bore out the reputation he has made for himself of being one of the best singers of Scotch song north of Toronto. Of Mr. Benson it is sufficient to say that he is a whole concert in himself. These gentlemen gave their services gratis and received the hearty thanks of the committee. Markdale has reason to be proud of them.

ANCIENT ORDER OF UNITED WORKMEN.—There are over 12,000 members of this Order in Ontario. There was no assessments for the months of August and September. During the last eight months the Order has increased at the rate of three hundred per month in Ontario. The Order at large on 1st September was 167,000. During 1885 the increase was 24,000, and during the eighteen years over $15,000,000 were paid to widows and orphans of the Order. At last meeting of the Supreme Lodge the Province of Quebec and Manitoba were annexed to the Province of Ontario.

Canadian Live-Stock Journal.

There have been few more marked successes in Journalism than has been achieved by the CANADIAN LIVE-STOCK JOURNAL, of Hamilton, Ont. Started less than three years ago as a 20 page monthly, it is going on steadily increasing in matter and interest, as well as in size, first to 24, then to 28. and finally to 36 pages. Though devoted especially to stock-raising. it includes The Dairy, The Farm, The Apairy, Poultry, Horticulture and the Home, so that the general farmer or such farmers as make live-stock breeding in any of its departments a leading feature of their business, we do not know where to find its equal in Canada. We heartly reckommend it to our patrons as the leading paper of its class in the Dominion. It is published at Hamilton, Ont., by the Stock Journal Co. Price $1 per annum. Those subscribing now for 1887 get the remainder of 1886 free. We can furnish it and our own paper together from now to the end of 1887 for $2.00 The October and November issue will contain the prize list of the Industrial Exhibition, Toronto and the Province Fair held in Guelph. From our own Correspondent.

The Methodist church here is being vaneered.

Andrew Wickens has sold his farm near Kimberely to a man from British Columbia.

One of our citizens after hearing the Salvation Army said. it was Methodism set to music and dancing.

The annual shooting match comes off on the 22nd. The boys always turn out in large numbers and have a good time. C. Cow and J, McCounell are captains.

There appears to be a good demand renowne dvalley apples, as they are being disposed of by loads. Now is the time to get them cheap before they are housed or pitted for the winter.

Our politicians are inclined to put a candidate in the field who will work for the good of the country in preference to party.

Maxwell.

From our own correspondent

Mr. James Coutts died last Tuesday and was buried on Thursday in the Presbyterian burying ground. Mr. Coutts was a respected old resident and his children to the fourth generation live about here. He was eighty-three years old.

Miss Eliza Hamlin left last Thursday to visit her brother in St. Louis, Mo. She expects to be gone all winter.

Mr. James Buckingham intends building a commodious brick house, I believe the foundation will be built soon, and the house will be finished early next summer. It will be a nice large mansion, I suppose a sort of "Buckingham Palace."

Resting After Meals.

In connection with a piece of advice frequently given the following remarks will prove instructive :—

A friend of the writer's, who suffered from dyspepsia during almost her entire life, considers the following suggestions to be the most in accord with her own experience of anything on the subject lately published :—

Hurried eating of meals, followed immediately by some employment that occupies the whole attention, and takes up all, or nearly all, the physical energies, is sure to result in dyspepsia in one form or another. Sometimes it shows itself in excessive irritability,—a sure indication that nerve force has been exhausted ; the double draught, in order to digest the food and carry on the business, has been more than nature could stand without being thrown out of balance. In another case, the person is exceedingly dull as soon as he has a few moments of leisure. The mind seems a dead blank, and can only move in its accustomed channels, and then only when compelled. This, also, is an indication of nervous exhaustion. Others will have decided pains in the stomach, or a sense of weight, as if a heavy burden was inside. Others, again, will be able to eat nothing that will agree with them everything that is put inside the stomach is made the subject of violent protest on the part of the organ, and that person suffers untold agonies in consequence. Others suffer from constant hunger. They may eat all can, and still feel hungry. If they feel satisfied for a little time, the least unusual exertion brings on the hungry feeling, and they can do no more until something is eaten. It is almost needless to say that this condition is not hunger, but inflammation of the stomach. Scarcely any two persons are affected exactly in the same way, the disordered condition manifesting itself according to temperament and occupation, employments that call for mental work, and those whose scene of action lies indoors, affecting persons more seriously than those carried on in the open air, and those which are merely mechanical, and do not engage the mind.

All, or nearly all, of these difficulties of digestion might never have been known by the sufferers had they thrown off the cares of their business, and rested a short time after eating, instead of rushing off to work immediately after hastily swallowing their food.

Nature does not do two things at a time and do both well, as a rule. All know that when a force is divided, it is weakened. If the meal were eaten slowly, without preoccupation of the mind, and the stomach allowed at least half an hour's chance to get its work well undertaken before the nervous force is turned in another direction, patients suffering from dyspepsia would be few.

A physician once said, "It does not so much matter what we eat, as how we eat it." While this is only partly true, it certainly is true that the most healthful food hurriedly eaten and immediately followed by work which engages the entire available physical and mental forces, is much worse than a meal of poor food eaten leisurely, and followed by an interval of rest.

How Much Shall We Eat ?

It is clear that with the wise men of old quantity rather than quality was the ruling law ; not what a man ate, but how much he ate was the capital thing for him to consider. A tolerably simple diet is advised, though the wise Lessius holds that the quality of the food matters little, so that the man be healthy ; but whatever it be, let there be moderation ; measure is the one thing needful. The difficulty of finding this measure is confessed : "Lust knows not," says St. Augustine, "where necessity ends." By the time he had reached his thirty-sixth year Cornaro had accustomed himself to a daily measure of twelve ounces of food and fourteen of drink—which does not, I own convey an exact notion to me, though I take it we Gargantuans should find the measure small. He does not seem to have been particular what he ate. He found it no labor to write immediately after meals. On the contrary his spirits were then so brisk that had he to sing a song to get rid of his superfluous energies before sitting down to his desk. Lessius is loath to commit himself to any certain scale : "If thou dost usually take so much food at meals as thou art thereby made unfit for the duties and offices belonging to the mind, . . . it is then evident that thou dost exceed the measure which thou oughtest to hold." He tells, on ancient authority, some marvelous tales of the little men have found enough to keep body and soul together : how one throve through a long life on milk alone, how another lived for twenty years on cheese. In monasteries and in the universities this desired measure is, he says, more easily to be found, for there either the statutes of the societies, or the "discreet orders of the superiors" have ordained the quantities of wine and beer that are fit to be drunk. Of monasteries I have no experience. but in the universities I have been given to understand that it is (or was, for the old order changes now so fast that it is hard to say what a day may not bring forth) the custom to leave such matters mainly to the discreetness of the students—which, it may be, is like Goethe's poetry, not always inevitable enough. On the whole, Lessius seems to incline to Cornara's allowance as sufficient, and perhaps as good an average as it is possible to strike. But he insists, as do all these antique sages, that the measure must vary with the age, condition, and business of the man. No hard and fast rule can be there.—Popular Science Monthly.

Snails.

Snails are largely eaten on the Continent. In the markets of Spain may be counted as many as fifteen different species offered for sale ; while snail-gardens are common all over Europe. There is, for example, one at Ulm, near Wurtemburg, which sends out no fewer than ten millions of the largest kind —the Helix pomatia—to be fattened in other gardens before being sent to the various convents in Austria for consumption during Lent. At Dijon a snail farmer clears about three hundred pounds per annum. Large quantities of the common snail are sold in Covent-Garden Market to the foreign colonies in London. It is also said that they are collected round London for exportation on a small scale to Paris and the United States.

LATE DOMINION NEWS.

Aylmer has become a town.

Mr. John Clark, of Crowfoot, N. W. T., had twelve horses stolen by Indians one night recently.

The Bank of Montreal is about to establish agencies at Calgary, N. W. T., and at Vancouver, B. C.

The potato rot is so serious in the vicinity of Stanbridge East, Que., that many fields will be left undug.

The area of the town of Smith's Falls has been increased by the additions of portions of the townships of Montague, North Elmsley, South Elmsley, and Wolford.

A five-pound cucumber and a nine-pouud beet have been forwarded to the office of The Missisquoi Record, and the editor has expressed the proper degree of surprise.

Farmers in the vicinity of the River Desert, the Peche, and North Wakefield, in the Gatineau district, are much troubled by bears, which infest the entire district. One farmer in North Wakefield has lost thirty sheep by their depredations this season.

Mr. Henry Dumble, of Kingston, aged 68, was for years perfectly bald, but last spring his hair again appeared, and now he has a fine growth of it, and very black. His whiskers are also turning black although before he was fifty years of age they were grey.

A young man, aged 21 years, named A. Hay was feeding the grain into a threshing machine at Mildmay, and in holding on to a sheaf to prevent it from going in too fast, his feet slipped from under him. He fell in, was torn to pieces, and instantly killed.

A dispatch from Victoria, B. C., reports a valuable gold find close to the boundary between British Columbia and Alaska, and says that already the quantity taken out had realized $24,000. The question of jurisdiction is likely to be raised, as the boundary between Alaska and the British territory has never been defiued.

A dispatch from Indian Head, N. W. T., says the Indians are becoming bolder each day. A man named Guardapie, while guarding property for the Medicine Hat Range Company about twenty miles away, was held up by eight Blood Indians and relieved of his rifle, revolver, and everything else of any value. Horse stealing began about the time the police outposts were ordered in.

Recently Alfred Sutton and Daniel Mahoney were hunting deer in the woods at Cowichin, B. C. Neither party knew the other was out, and Mahony, seeing Sutton moving in the bush, and thinking he was a deer, raised his gun and fired. The ball passed through Sutton's heart, killing him instantly. The deceased was a native of Bruce, Ont., and a nephew of Sheriff Sutton, of that county.

A few days ago a young man named John Pratt was mobbed near Stittsville by a gang of boys, who, after otherwise ill-treating him, shaved off one side of his moustache and the hair off one side of his head. The victim was also badly beaten, and has since been under medical treatment. The young man's father offers a reward for the apprehension of the guilty parties.

A young man named Martin Dolan, while carrying away grain from a threshing mill in operation on the farm of Mr. Chas. Butler, Fitzroy, inadvertently stepped backward against the driving shaft, and a loose woollen garment which the young man was wearing to preserve his clothes, caught in the shaft, and he was whirled violently against the ground and instantly killed.

During the recent great Central Fair in Hamilton a car was waiting on a switch on King-street for the up car to pass when a heavy old man strode over and asked the driver :—"Is this—the car—for the—Toronto—train ?" The driver said that it would take him there with a transfer. "How long do you wait ?" asked the old man, "I shall want to go in about an hour."

Mr. Hervey Smith, of the first concession of Malahide and brother of Havelock Smith, who is charged with the murder of Marshall Piggot, has taken proceedings against Mr. Asa Marr, a wealthy farmer of the same neighborhood, for $5,000 damages for alleged slander. It is charged that the accused has frequently expressed his belief that Mr. Smith was implicated in the crime for which his brother has been twice tried.

Mr. John McCauley, of Chatsworth, lost a bull a couple of weeks ago, and after a six days' search found the poor brute fast in the bush in the rear of his farm. The animal's head and foot were fastened together with a chain, and the chain had caught on a snag, and in its efforts to get loose the bull had wound the chain around the snag, until his head was down to the ground. The animal when found was a mere skeleton, having been six days without food or water.

At Campobello, N. B., there is a child named Glendower Evans Brown, who has nine grand parents and great-grand parents living within a mile of each other. The child is a grandson of Bartholomew Brown and wife, and great-grand child to Col. James Brown and wife on his father's side, and on the mother's side a grandchild of John Mitchell and wife, and great-grandchild of John Mitchell's mother, Mrs. Peters, who is a daughter of Thomas Mathews and wife, who are also great-grand parents to the child.

Recently a young woman arrived at Victoria, B. C., on her way from Seattle to Nanaimo. Her trunk was landed at the wharf from which the Nanaimo boat starts, but not being aware of this fact she engaged an expressman to take her box to the wharf from which the steamer for Nanaimo would start. The unprincipled luggage handler exacted pay in advance, drove around the block with the trunk, and deliberately brought it back to the place whence he started. Victoria has at least one expressman who would make a fine subject for police court treatment.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"Dis has bin axed," said Brother Gardner, as he looked up and surveyed the bald heads up and down the centre aisle, "If dis club am interested in internashunal queshuns ! I should smile dat it am ! I has also bin axed to define our posishun on the fishery an' de Mexican queshun. As to de former queshun if dar am a treaty which says dat we kin catch fish a long Canadian shores, lets continue to catch until de treaty am torn up. If dar' hain't no treaty, we hev no more right in Canadian waters dan dem Cannucks hev in Yankee co'nfields. I' seems to me dat de queshun am so plain dat nobody need puzzle ober it ten seconds.

"As to de Mexican queshun, dar' am no treaty about it. Sunthin' ober seventy years ago dis kentry kicked up a row ober de queshun of sailor's rights. Eber sence dat war closed no American citizen residin' in a furrein' kentry has had any rights to go to war about. He kin be illegally arrested, illegally plundered, illegally imprisoned or put to death, an' de case doan' worry our State Department. Dis state of affairs has continued until de weakest nashun on de face of de airth feels safe in abusin' American citizens. If any of 'em chance to be purtected, it am by a British Consul, backed by de British flag an' a British gun-boat.

"Dar' has bin a good deal of talk among de members of dis club. Samuel Shin has walked aroun' o' nights wid a big sword buckled aroun' him, an' Shindig Watkins has h'isted an American flag in his back yard an' sworn to shoot any Mexican who hauled it down. Some of you am jist achin' to die fur yer kentry, an' de rattle of de drum makes Elder Toots an' Uncle Jackson breathe as hard as a hoss gallopin' up hill. Drap it. Dar' hain't gwine to be any war. Uncle Sam am gwine to put on a grin an' purtend to be well satisfied, an' Mexico am gwine to chuckle to herself an' be a leetle mo' keerful fur de nex' six months."

ELECTION.

On motion of Sir Isaac Walpole the meeting then opened on the thirty-third degree and proceeded to the election of local officers. There has been a great deal of wire-pulling during the summer in regard to these offices, and it was felt that the election would prove an exciting contest. An informal ballot for Secretary brought out thirteen candidates, five of whom could neither read nor write. When this fact came to be whispered about, Brother Gardner arose and said :

"I want to say to you five gem'len dat dis am not a pollytical 'leckshun. If it was you'd be all right. A man kin leave de fool asylum to-day an' run fur alderman in any city in de land to-morrer, but we do bizness on a different basis in dis club. De five of you purceed to absquatulate or you'll h'ar sunthin' drap !"

A formal ballot was then taken, and Way down Bebee was re-elected by a majority of 28. He returned his thanks in a few well selected words, in which he rung in Nero, Plato, the great Sahara Desert and the Mormon question. An informal ballot for Treasurer brought out twenty-eight candidates, and the feeling promised to be so high that the President again rose and said :

"My frens, I doan' want to keep interruptin' de purceedin's, but I mus' remind you agin dat dis club doan' hold its 'leckshuns on a polytical basis. In pollyticks it am not eben considered cheeky fur an embezzler to lay his wires to become a public treasurer, but de case am different heah. Dar's a heap of you who doan' know 'nuff to add five to seben, or to subtract two from six, an' dar' am some others who could't get a bond of $50 signed to save deir necks. Dar' mus' be more absquatulashun."

His brief speech produced a wonderful effect. A formal ballot brought out only three candidates, and of those Trustee Pullback received a majority of the votes and was declared elected. He expressed his thanks in broken remarks, which were about equally divided between the glacial period and the latest improvements in cornshellers, and sat down amidst the heartiest applause.

Brother Gardner said that other committees of less importance might be named later on. Such persons as had been named were expected to enter into committee work with energy and enthusiasm, and seek to make a success of whatever they might be asked to do. It was announced that the Library would open at 7 and close at 10 o'clock through the fall and winter months, and frequenters of the place were cautioned about indulging in either political or religions debates in the room. The janitor was instructed to secure the services of a civil engineer to make a survey of the hall stove and estimate the amount of money which would put it in safe condition for the winter, and the Keeper of the Sacred Relics was cautioned to keep his eyes peeled for a cheap bust of Gen. Jackson to stand in the southwest corner of the main hall. The meeting then went home.

Filial Love.

There is not on earth a more lovely sight than the unwearied care and attention of children to their parents. Where filial love is found in the heart we will answer for all the other virtues. No young man or woman will ever turn out basely, we sincerly believe, who has parents respected and beloved. A child affectionate and dutiful will never bring the gray hairs of his parents to the grave. It is seldom the case that a dutiful son is found in the ranks of vice, among the wretched and degraded. Filial love will keep men from sin and crime. There never will come a time, while their parents live, when their children will not be under obligations to them. The older they grow, the more need will there be for assiduous care and attention to their wants. The venerable brow and frosty hair speak loudly to the love and compassion of the child. If sickness and infirmity make them at times fretful, the younger folk should beat with them patiently, not forgetting that time ere long may bring them to need the same care and attention. Filial love will never go unrewarded.

Thomas Carlyle,

the great Scotch author, suffered all his life with dyspepsia, which made his own life miserable and caused his best and truest friends not a little pain because of his irritableness. Dyspepsia generally arises from diseases of the liver, and as Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery" cures all diseases of this great gland, it follows that while all cannot be Carlyles, even with dyspepsia, all can be free from the malady, while emulating his virtues.

Then Ben Bowline spoke to Dolan in his growling, bear-like fashion:

"Captain Dolan, you had better let the boy alone; one volunteer, you know, is worth a dozen pressed men and I don't know that a pressed boy is worth anything at all, seeing that a voluuteer of that sort always wants two able-bodied seaman to go after him and see what he is about. Ain't that it Martin?"

"Ay, ay!"

"Well, then, Captain Dolan, you'd much better let the boy alone and put him on shore next voyage, d'ye see? for he will never be of any use on board the Rift."

"Never," said Martin.

"Well, well," growled Dolan. "Don't bother about it; only it's hard lines that a man mightn't do as he likes with his own flesh and blood. Keep her off a bit."

"Ay, ay, sir."

"You know, my men, that this is to be our last voyage, hereaway if so be as we are successful in what we agreed to do."

The crew murmured an assent.

"You see the Coquette there? Well, you know that she trades with us, bringing us French goods and money both, for which we give her English goods and money. Now this time, she brings an extra cargo and with a good round sum for English goods she expects of us. Well, asthis part of the coast is getting too hot to hold us and as I know, for certain, the admiral of the station, Sir Thomas Clifford, has brought down here a schooner, well armed and manned, on purpose to lay out for us and to follow us into shallow water, why, I propose that we be off to another coast, up by the north sea, where, from Dutch ports, a good trade can be done."

The crew assented with various expressions of satisfaction, while the steersman baffled the French lugger, the Coquette, which evidently wished to come to close quarters with the Rift."

"Now," added Dolan, "what I propose is, to take the Coquette, and all in her."

"That'll do," said Ben Bowline.

"Clear her out!"

"Ay, ay!"

"And then scuttle her."

There was a pause of irresolution among the crew of the Rift and Dolan hastily added:

"They or us! They or us! If one is left to tell the tale, it will be told and a chessemaree will go across to Falmouth with a flag of truce and the admiral of the station will know all about us."

"Its an ugly trick," said Ben Bowline.

"But they are only Frenchmen," remarked one of the crew.

"There's something in that," said Martin.

"Are you all agreed?" cried Dolan.

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"Then you see it is just as well that Gerald should not be on deck," added Dolan, while the strange, malignant look flashed from his eyes.

By this time the French lugger apparently had begun to suspect that the Rift, for some reason or another, was dodging her and she shortened sail and lay to, making only a little headway with the tide and surface wind.

A brief order, then, that altered the trim of the Rift to a limited extent and her course a point or two, brought her down rapidly toward the Coquette and when within hailing distance Captain Dolan sprang on one of the guns and shouted:

"Coquette, ahoy! What cheer?"

A light, active, little old man leaped with the agility of an ape on to the bowsprit of the Coquette and screamed out:

"Captaine Doolan, vat for you—vat you call?—make one game at our Coquette? Captaine Doolan, sir l'honneur—le sang du Francais, bah! I was mooch mad!"

"Wind and currents," shouted Dolan, "All's right. Any news?"

"Ma foi, non! What you shall call common—much usual. Plus de gloire pour la Grande Nation!"

"Oh, of course. Smashed the English fleet."

"Oui, certainement."

"What does the animal say?" Growled Ben Bowline.

"That the French have beaten the English fleet."

"Does he? Does he? The lying old—well, it don't matter. He's a going—"

Ben pointed into the sea and the crew of the Rift grinned at each other as the lugger now slowly drifted alongside the Rift, which had lain to within a couple of hundred yards of the Frenchman.

These two vessels, long engaged in smuggling transactions, were adapted in every way for the rapid interchange of cargoes. Slowly they were allowed to drift broadside to each other and then, by apparatus which was produced on both vessels, they were locked together, so that they heaved and rolled in the tide as one.

The little French captain leaped on the deck of the Rift and lifted his cap with great grace to Captain Dolan and then to the mate, Ben Bowline, and then to the crew, and each time that he did so he gave an amiable grin, similar to that which is adopted by very polite people at public dinners when they take wine with some one.

"Well, Captain Mocquet," said Dolan, "will you step below?"

"Oui, Capitaine Doolan, oui, I sall step below; but I sall, if you sall please, capitaine, bring goods."

"All right!"

The French captain, then, with great volubility, gave some orders to the five men that made up the whole crew of the Coquette, and they commenced transferring to the deck of the Rift various barrels and packages, not one of which was of sufficient size or weight to exceed the power of a single man to lift and deal with.

The object of this was that, should it become necessary so to do, the smuggled goods might be easily flung into the sea, without much fuss or observation.

The French captain then descended with Dolan to the cabin of the Rift, where the first person his eyes fell upon was Gerald, who was close to one of the small ports, with the hatchet still grasped in his right hand.

"My son," said Dolan, gruffly.

The French captain lifted his cap and gave his usual amiable grin. Gerald bowed with a sad look upon his face.

"Le petit monsieur is not—what you say?—good—well—eh?"

"Not very well," said Dolan.

A whispered conference then took place between Dolan and the French captain, which seemed to have reference to a sum of ten thousand francs, and to some cases of English cutlery, and marine chronometers, and nautical instruments, but the particulars of which Gerald did not catch.

Then they went upon deck, the French captain not forgetting, as he left the cabin, to bestow upon Gerald tho inevitable grin again, and the lift of the cap.

"Francois!" cried Captain Mocquet, "apportez."

One of the crew of the Coquette appeared then on the deck of the Rift with a square box, around which some canvas was carefully sewn. Then Dolan took the Frenchman by the cuff of the coat, and on the pretense that he had something to say to him, he led him close to the skylight that looked down upon the swinging table in the cabin. The skylight was half off and left a considerable space by the side of it.

"My dear Mocquet!" said Dolan.

The Frenchman looked curiously in Dolan's face, with his head on one side.

"My dear Monsieur Mocquet you must know—"

"Eh!"

"That there you go; for you are not wanted here."

As he spoke, Dolan clutched the French captain by the collar and his waist, and with one effort plunged him down the portion of the skylight of the cabin which was open. He fell with a crash on the table beneath.

"Batten down!" shouted Dolan, then, in a voice that rang through both vessels. "Down with them! Quick—quick! That will do! Ha, ha!"

The five Frenchmen were seized by as many of the Englishmen, and dashed headlong down the forecastle-hatch of the lugger on which they immediately placed its foul-weather covering, which they fastened in a moment.

The Coquette was taken and rode side by side with the Rift, at the mercy of Dolan and his crew.

"A strange sail to the nor'west!" sang out Martin, who was sweeping the sea with a glass, at the direction of Dolan, to find if any vessel was sufficiently near to observe his proceedings in regard to the Coquette.

"What is she?"

"Don't know, sir. She looks foreign."

"Not likely that; but be quick! Follow me, my men. You six, I mean who are carpenters,. Follow me with your tools.

"Ay, ay, sir!" cried six of the crew of the Rift, who had been privately spoken to by captain Dolan, and whose duty now was to scuttle the Coquette, while he repared to Captain Mocquet's cabin, in order to see if any small valuables could be found there which it would be a pity to let go down with the lugger.

So completely taken by surprise were the crew of the Coquette, that scarcely one of them uttered an exclamation, when they were seized and flung down the forecastle hatch of their own vessel.

Now when Dolan and his six men went on board the Coquette, all they heard was subdued knocking on the other side of the hatchway covering.

"Let them knock," he said. "It will be short work with them. Ben Bowline, hoy!"

"Ay, sir."

"Keep a good watch there."

Captain Dolan pointed to the cabin hatch of the Rift and Ben nodded; for he had seen the French captain cast through the opening in the skylight.

While, then, the six men from the Rift went into the hold of the lugger to scuttle her, Captain Dolan dived into Captain Mocquet's cabin.

At first he could see nothing that was at all likely to excite his cupidity, although he glared about him with the most eager eyes. Then he forced open the drawer of a locker and was gratified to find a watch and some fine articles of jewelry. Another drawer had in it a pair of silver-mounted pistols of great beauty of workmanship, although, from their being of Turkish make, they were but toys in comparison to English firearms.

"I may as well have them," said Dolan, as he thrust them into his breast.

He tried still another drawer of the locker and found that it was a deep one, that held sequins and other matters, apparently medicines.

"That will do," he said. "Good-bye to the Coquette soon, and a good riddance, too; for I do believe that Captain Mocquet by, dint of prying about and questioning some of my men, had half found out our great secret of the entrance to the cavern by the foreland thereaway, and in that case I would take his life or the life of any man who is dangerous."

"A sail westward!" shouted a voice on board the Rift.

"Another!" growled Captain Dolan, as he still lingered in the cabin of the Coquette, loth to loose any article of value that he could carry away with him. "I wonder if these candlesticks are silver?"

"Hand over hand, sir, this way. A schooner, with the king's ensign at the fore," cried a voice from the Rift, speaking apparently, in answer to some questions that had been put by Ben Bowline, probably.

"Hillo!" cried Dolan, from the door of the Coquette's cabin, "are you ready? Have you done it?"

A strange rushing sound came upon his ears, and he could almost fancy that the lugger shook beneath him as the sea rushed into her.

"All's done, captain," said one of the men.

"When will she go?"

"Not for ten minutes good yet, sir."

"That will do."

"The Frenchmen are praying, sir, to be let loose."

"Let them pray."

Once more Captain Dolan turned to the cabin of the Coquette and oourscd his eyes slowly around it, to be certain that he had escaped nothing, when he almost uttered a shout of surprise and fright to see a portion of the paneling of the wall suddenly slide aside, and the most charming of faces appear at the opening—while, in the silvery accents of childhood, a young girl of not more than twelve years of age, said:

"Bon jour, mon cher pere. Ou sommes-nou?"

Captain Dolan stood aghast, while with a look of unmitigated surprise, into which fear was each instant growing, the young French girl fixed her beautiful eyes upon his face. The Coquette rocked a little from side to side and the water gurgled and rushed into her hold.

"She's going by the board, sir!" cried one of the crew of the Rift. "Tumble up, sir! She's going!"

CHAPTER IV.

THE STARS AND STRIPES ARE UNFURLED.

So thoroughly surprised was Captain Dolan to find that there was any one on board the Coquette but the French captain and her crew that although warned of the sinking state of the lugger, he was for a few minutes transfixed and incapable of action.

But the utter selfishness of the nature of Dolan was not likely to keep him for many moments inactive, when personal peril to himself was at hand. He recovered from his faculties with a shout of fear, and flew towards the companion-way, only pausing for one half instant to cry out:

"Who are you? Who are you?"

The girl made some reply which he did not understand; and as he fled to the deck, he just saw her glide out of the little berth in which she had been sleeping.

"Let her go! Let her go with the rest!" he said, hoarsely, "I did not place her there. He should not have brought her. It is his doing, not mine. Let her go! let her go!"

There was a faint stream from the cabin, and then the Coquette visibly settled in the water.

Captain Dolan made but one leap on to the deck of the Rift, and then he shouted:

"Let go! Let go! she is going down! Let her go! Keep all clear fore and aft, there."

The fastenings that held the two vessels together were hastily removed, and the Coquette slowly surged away down from the Rift.

Then it was that Ben Bowline stepped up to Captain Dolan and said, in a low voice:

"Sir, I don't like the look of things."

"What things?"

"The craft there-away."

"Ah!"

So absorbed had been Dolan in his interest in the fate of the Coquette, that he had forgotten the two announcements that had been made of sails at hand; but now he turned his gaze in the direction indicated by Ben Bowline; and at about three miles in the offing he saw a small vessel, yacht-built and rigged, and evidently bearing down upon him; while, at about the same distance from that again, but in a slant line, which brought it within five miles of the Rift, was a schooner with St. George's ensign flying.

"I know her," cried Captain Dolan.

"Which, sir?"

"The schooner. It's the Spray. She is sent after us by Sir Thomas Clifford. I told you of her."

"And the other?"

"Oh! a mere yacht."

"She has no colors, sir."

"Of course not."

"Ah, yes! Look, sir; loek! I began to to think that—"

"What—what?"

Slowly and gracefully as the yacht-like vessel altered her point of sailing a little, a flag unfurled itself, and shaking its folds out to the breeze, presented the stars and stripes of the Great Republic.

"American!" cried Dolan.

"No doubt of that, sir; and a clipper. Look how she cuts her way, with scarce a ripple in her wake!"

"What's that?"

Boom came the report of a gun from the schooner, And, as if the elements had only awaited that as a signal, a dense fog came whirling from the French coast, and in a few minutes began to encircle the Rift in its misty embraces in such a manner that it was quite clear, if it did not soon dissipate, her captain, would not be able to see from stem to stern.

Boon came another report, and Captain Dolan cried out:

"How is it? That's a big gun for a schooner!"

"Special service, sir," said Martin. "Lord bless you, Captain! I was once aboard of one that was rigged out for special service, and they took a couple of twenty-fours with them, and blazed away like a good one."

"What special service?"

"After a pirate."

"In-deed. Ha! Well, my men, the example has been followed; for I happen to know that the schooner Spray is on special service, and that special service is to hunt down the Rift."

A suppressed execration burst from the smuggler crew, and then Dolan cried out:

"Is she gone—the Coquette?"

"There she goes, sir!"

Through the thickening mist, just faintly visible, as though it had been miles away, could be seen the low-lying hull and light spars of the French lugger—spectral-like she gloomed through the fog; and what of her could be seen appeared to sway about as though she were in the grasp of a tempest while, in reality, the little soft breeze that had been stirring was almost entirely quenched by the mist.

A shriek—one shriek—uttered in tones that Captain Dolan felt that he recognized, came upon the light wind; and he felt his heart grow cold as he listened to it.

"The girl in the cabin," he said. "The girl in the cabin, no—no! It was not safe to rescue her—not safe. I could not. Will she cry again?"

A rushing noise now took place, and no longer was to be seen the shadowy form of the French lugger. Captain Dolan drew a long breath. The girl had not uttered another cry, and he was saved the terror of its remembrance.

But the one was enough!

He—even he—thatman steeped ininiquity and sin; that man, whose hands were the red ones of a murderer, could not forget the gentle look in those child-like eyes, and the soft cadences of the sweet voice, as she spoke the few words, the meaning of which was unknown to him. He passed his hand over his brow and a cold perspiration settled upon his face, and he shook in every limb.

"Gone! gone! I know she is gone. Why did she move the panel? Why did she look at me? Why did she speak to me? Gone! gone!"

"The lugger, sir, I mean."

"Eh?"

Dolan started as if from a dream; and then, in a voice of rage, he said:

"I know she has gone! Don't speak to me—and be hanged to you all! I know she is gone! Keep her off there; we drift in—I am sure of it; the fog thickens!"

"Ay, ay sir! it does!" said Martin. "And it won't clear away till midday, I should say."

"Cutter ahoy!" shouted a voice evidently through a speaking-trumpet, at this moment, although through the dense masses of white mist there could not now be seen anything of the American yacht or the king's schooner.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Ventriloquism.

Men will never cease to wonder over ventriloquism, though the accomplishment has often been explained, and is mastered without great difficulty. In former times the people stood in awe of the ventriloquists. Comte, a famous French prestidigitateur, was exceedingly fond of mystifying country people, and once caused a pig, which a peasant woman was trying to sell, to talk. The pig was accused of sorcery, and led by the ears before the judge, terrifying the man who led him by calling him an "idiot" all the way.

At Tours Comte caused the people to break in the front of a closed shop, from which cries for help seemed to proceed. At Nevers he made a donkey accuse the peasant who rode him of cruelty, and the peasant, believing the donkey bewitched, leaped off the animal's back and took to flight. At Fribourg Comte was accused of witchcraft, and taken to a furnace by an excited crowd to be burned alive. But he caused a dreadful voice to issue from the doors of the furnace itself, and the frightened people ran away.

Although people nowadays are in no fear of witchcraft, some clever ventriloquism is practised. An Englishman counterfeits so skilfully the noise made by doors creaking and windows rattling in a draught, that people draw up their collars and button their coats to save themselves from taking cold. Most of our ventriloquism, however, is done with puppets and manikins, which one man apparently causes to speak in different voices.

La Nature, a French scientific journal, explains the art of ventriloquism in a recent article. It is based on a well-known acoustic phenomenon, the difficulty which the ear experiences in locating the precise point from which a sound comes. We have only to lead the mind to suppose that a sound comes from a certain point to make it seem to the ear to do so.

The chief difficulty in the art is the keeping of a perfectly straight face, and speaking without moving the muscles. The deception is assisted by the ventriloquist's moving his lips and face in a very apparent manner when he asks his questions in his own proper voice, and then restoring his face to a perfectly motionless state, or one in which the lips seem to move only in a slight smile.

Ventriloquists fill their lungs very full of air, and expel it slowly aud gradually in speaking. Facility in imitating various sounds is obtained by practice. Saint Gilles, a Parisian grocer, who became celebrated as a ventriloquist a century ago, and whose fame has come down to the present time, mastered his art in eight days of steady practice.

'Steering Straight For Home."

BY NORA LAUGHER.

[A thoughtless young gentleman when crossing the Atlantic had his attention called to the bright, happy look of one of the common sailors—a man of some sixty years—who, upon being questioned as to why he always appeared so cheerful, replied promptly, as he reverently bared his head and looked up to the clear, blue sky "I don't know, sir, unless it is because "I'm steering straight for home."

What an eloquent sermon do not these few words convey?]

In storm or shine I'm happy, sir,
As o'er the waves I roam,
I'll tell you why if you like, sir,
I'm steering straight for Home.

I do not mean my home on land,
I lost that when Bess died,
She and the young 'un too, sir,
They both lie side by side.

She was my wife, the bonniest lass
You'd see upon the main,
That's why I always try to steer
Straight Home to Bess again.

Oh! I shall ne'er forget the night
When I breasted thro' the foam
To find my girl's life ebbing fast,
For she was nearing Home.

I was a careless chap, sir, then,
Just thirty years ago;
But my life changed with her last words,
Uttered so soft and low.

She said, as she clasped our little 'un
And her head lay on my breast
"I'm drifting from you, Jack, my dear,
And oh! I cannot rest

Until you give me your promise
That you will try and come
Where I shall wait you, near the Sea,
Say, Jack, you'll steer for Home?"

The bitter tears rolled down my cheek,
I knelt beside the bed,
And since that day, sir, I have kept
My oath, made to the dead.

'Tis easier every day, sir,
I look across the foam
And hear my Bessie calling me
To steer right straight for Home.

Since the earthquake we are beginning to suspect that the South is not as solid as represented.

"She did wrong to look back; didn't she, Bessie?" "Yes, mamma." "And what do you think Lot thought when he saw his poor wife turned into a pillar of salt." "I don't know, mamma; I 'spect he wondered where he could get a fresh one."

EUPHRASIA EXHIBITION.

This Society held its show at the city of Rocklyn on Friday last, 8th inst. The weather was all could be desired, and a large crowd was in attendance. This is one of the best township fairs in the district, and the one this year was no exception to the rule. Every class was well represented and close competition was a result in many classes. The energetic and courteous secretary, Mr. J, L. Wilson, appeared to be the right man in the right place.

EARLY CLOSING.

As may be seen by our advertising columns this week, our merchants have decided to close their respective places of business at 7 o'clock p. m. during the fall and winter as well as the summer months, except on Saturday nights. It is needless to say that, in reference to this movement the clerks all say "Amen."

The conclusion came to is that all the business can be done before 7 o'clock as well as not, without any particular inconvenience to any. and at a great saving of expence in light and fuel, and besides they (the merchants) did not feel disposed to provide a supply of spittoons necessary for the accommodation of loafers, who are the chief frequenters of stores after the above hour.

We hope all may endeavor to govern themselves in accordance with this movement and thus assist in carrying it into effect.

EAST GREY CONSERVATIVE CONVENTION.

The convention of East Grey met in solemn conclave at Markdale last Monday for the purpose of choosing candidates for the Commons and Local Legislature for the coming elections.

The weather was most gorgeous for this season of the year, and a large representation from the various municipalities were present. The press was also well represented, Messrs. Patterson of the Meaford Mirror, Starrett of the Thornbury News Mortimer of Shelburne Free Pree and Fawcett of the Flesherton Advance being present. The meeting was held in the roller skating rink, a very suitable place, Mr. Thos. Kells, president in the chair. [The first nomination being, for the Dominion Parliament, Dr. Sproule, M. P., received the unanimous vote of the convention without opposition.

The following were then nominated for the Local, viz,—Capt Rorke, N. McColman, Thos. Kells, Thos. McKenny, Thos. Gilray, Dr. Christoe and John Lyons, the two latter withdrew before the vote was taken. On the first ballot Capt Rorke led with N. McColman second and T. Kells third. The second ballot gave Rorke a large majority over all others combined, when he was declared the unanimous choice of the convention by a standing vote. The various candidates expressed themselves well pleased with the result and determined to give the nominee their hearty support. Capt. Rorke thanked the meeting heartily for their confidence after which the convention broke up well pleased with the result and delighted with the great harmony which prevailed throughout.

Dr. Sproule, M. P. and Capt. Rorke provided a sumptuous supper at the Markdale House for the company, about 200.

Sam. Jones.

Rev. Sam. Jones, the Southern revivalist, is now in Toronto and will remain there for some three weeks. He is drawing crowds to hear him, and can interest a congregation for a whole hour at a time that would grow impatient under ordinary circumstances at 40 minutes. The following are some of his aphorisms.—

Show me a Church that does not believe in revivals and I will show you a Church that looks like an abandoned cemetery.

Stagnation is the last station this side of damnation.

It is an abnormal state of things that makes revivals necessary.

Religion is royalty to God, and the right holiness is a hundred cents in the dollar. It is doing the square thing every time you do anything.

Fun is the next best thing to religion.

Character is builded by living in perfect harmony with God. Religion is harmony. Religion is the setting of the ten commandments to music in your soul.

It is mighty hard to talk sense for a whole hour and not bore some greenhorn.

It takes less sense to criticize than it does to do anything else in the world.

If you tell me what you love and what you hate I will tell you your character.

If you quit sinning you will quit doubting.

If a man believes he is right the next thing he wants is courage that will dare to do right.

A man is not a sinner because he is an infidl: he is an infidl because he is a sinner.

The greatest blessing that ever crowned an American or a Canadian church is a "game" preacher that is not afraid of man or devil.

If the devil ever puts his foot upon a woman once she never gets up any more.

I'm a Methodist just like I'm a Jones. I was born both, and am no more responsible for one than I am for the other.

The fact that I' m Methodist demonstrates the fact that I must be religious. Now, the Catholic Church has a Pope; the Presbyterian Church has its starch its dignity, and its education; the Baptist Church has its water. But if we poor Methodists haven't got religion we haven't got a thing in the world to run on.

I like to see the cross fences in the church pastures taken down. I like to see Presbyterians come over to the Methodist pasture a while and the Methodist go over and feed on the final perseverance grass a while. Somehow or another when they come back they stick better.

C. Blackett Robinson, Publisher, 5 JORDAN ST., TORONTO.

"Home Atmosphere" Continued.

We are apt to think that perhaps Tomkins a member of the "church" perhaps a class or Sabbath School superintendent who prays and exhorts in public and that unction and acceptance that therefore Tomkins' children are bro't up in the fear of an "atmosphere" of truth and purity this however we may be greatly mistaken. Tomkins may be a good man himself, sincere- anxious that his children should be bro't properly; but untortunately when a young he fell in love with a silly empty headed whose pretty face blinded him to her real and in course of time he consummat- his folly by marrying this frivolous good- nothing nincompoop, whose highest am- was to "Mash" a "dude" and attract tention. In due time Tomkins finds him- a father, no doubt a happy father but he discovers, if he has not found out be- that his handsome wife is ill fitted for ties of motherhood; but as his time is al- wholly taken up with the pressing con- ns of every day life he is unable to give ch attention to the children hense their and training necessarily falls almost lly on the shoulders of his incompeteed with results most discouraging. Now ing all this time Tomkins may be, and dless is, exerting himself as opportunity rs to instil right principles and set a ly example before his children, but all his rts are neutralized by the conduct of his fe whose opportunities for doing mischief exceed those of her husband to do good.

6. Another fatal error which a great many "pious" well disposed but simple weak- minded parents fall into is that of thinking they can make up for their own neglect ties to their children "praying"; that is say they weakly shirk an unpleasant duty try to have to throw the whole responsi- ity upon God. Is this honest? is this con- tent? What warrant have they to suppose God should interfere to counteract the sequences of their own disobedience of plain poecepts exhortations and com- s so fully set forth in His holly word?

7. There is no other social duty so plain, fully and so frequently enjoined in the ptures as the parental not only that of king provisions for the bodily wants of the ld, but also and in a far more urgent and portant sense of making provision for his ntual requirements and in the beautiful guage of the Prayer Book to "bring him p in the nature and admonition of the rd" and yet how egiegiously and wantonly s duty is ignored even by professing istians. How is it that this great evil s this erowning wickedness of our day and ion receives but scanty consideration m the Pulpit? Have the "watchmen" llen asleep? or are they afraid to speak out nst the withering sarcasm "physician heal self" be applied to them?

8. It has long been the opinion of the iter that the greatest evil which threatens social fabric in the present day is neglect- judiciously enforced parental authority in home circle. Children are allowed in ny families to grow up utterly regardless parental authority and as a consequence, the mills of Providence grind slowly they n exceeding small, their conduct in after invariably brings the blush of shame to face and the pang of remorse to the heart l conscience of the negligent and too in- lgent parent. If a child is not taught to ey its earthly parent "whom it hath seen" hose care and kindness hath nourished and tained it from its infancy, how can it be ght to obey its heavenly Parent" whom th not seen?" The child taught obed- nce rationally and kind by its parents will re and venerate them, whereas the spoiled ld, the indulge and disobedient child always ungrateful and void of filial affec- n.

9. All history, all experience prove the fact nce to cultivate reform and improve the rental and filial relation conformity with details of reason and in obedience to God's w and commandments are duties incumbent on all parents and will not, nay cannot e ignorant by any who are entitled to the me of christian. The parental duty of manding and enforcing and the co-rela- e duty of obedience and love incumbent on e children are fundamental principles ich constitute the very foundation of ligion and mortality and we fearlessly assert t that home and that family whose these nditions are conspicuously wantingis utter- void of true religion whatever be their pro- sion. Old Eli gets the credit of having en a good man in his day, of his goodness wever the writer has failed to find any ncible proof: if he were a good man he st have a very bad wife whose influence l fatally on her children. We fear the oodness" of Eli was very much of a piece th the "goodness" of many so-called re- ious people in our day it exhausted itself mere routine profesion and formulae, failed to recognise the truth "to obey is tter than sacrifice" hence the plain every ty which his own family and house- ld contumously presented was neglected der the vain delusion perhaps that the ublic ministrations of the sanctuary would some way aton for his delinquency.

It is a great mistake to suppose that praying preaching or any other public performrnces of religious rites, however valuable or important, will at all excuse us if we neglect the plain practical every day duties which domestic and social relations involve; they did not excuse Eli for we are told I Saml. 3, 18 "I will judge his house forever for the "iniqinty which he knoweth; because his "sons made themselves vile and he restrained "them not "If ye love me keep my command- "ments. "Not every "one that saith Lord, "Lord shall enter into the kingdom of heaven" but he that doeth the will of my father. &c Those and such like are the plain teachings of the Bible yet we find scores nay hundreds of people who profess to believe the Bible practically ignoring its precepts in the important matter of "training up their children" and yet those people have the audacity to pray to God to do what they themselves fail to do and that in violation of His plain commands —these are some of the reasons why untruthful mendacious and profligate children go out from homes where the "atmosphere" was supposed to be "truthfull pure and religious."

LITTLE TIM.

He had been born in a shameful place, and heir to unkindness and evil things. There were few other legacies, but many gifts were thrust upon him—sneers, snares, neglect, and severance from the luckier born—and these seemed fatal. It may be through a law and love insoluble to us it proved not so; that to the Great Father's heart the stains, and wrongs, and sorrows thrust upon the boy, as to an earthly parent's, made him but the dearer; but measured in the cold, hard, human way, his fate was sorrowful, indeed.

The region where he first took up the burden was a low one, a sunken, noisome quarter, the foul and squalid accretion of many sad conditions. Here a day of flat, low skies, and sobbing, quarrelsome winds, that ended by a wet fog driving in upon the great city and settling upon the filthy quarter like a death-cloth, had filled the vile neighborhood with unusual gloom. The spirit of insanity, the promptings to crime and abandon, always exhaled by such diseased, unhappy surroundings, seemed to increase and multiply with the oppressive darkness. In at the doorways of the low, half-lit saloons the steaming, pitiable populace jostled and crowded; from the thick, throat-clogging medium that filled the reeking, slippery streets, to the tongue-scalding, brain-maddening potions of the bar; from distempered elements without and within to mental ruin and forgetfulness.

In one of these haunts of evil, a place of shame, of villainous music and dancing, were negroes, Poles, Italians, and men and women, drunk and ruined, from Heaven knows what other quarter of the compass. What animalism! What faces! What swallowing of fire!

By midnight the back room was a numbing whirlpool of delirious feeling; heat, sweat, rags, music, liquor, profanity, the beat and shuffle of feet, cries, and maudlin laughter. Look at the roads along which these lives had come! threads running from under this lecherous roof to every quarter of the globe! to cradles over the sea, to mother-bosoms north and south, east and west!

Did God, seeing it all, grieve that life had been made a thing so capable of ill? or was the fault, somehow, society's?

At three o'clock in the morning they began to fight. In many the chords of sensation seemed eaten too raw for further pleasure. Then some one was struck down, and the reeling, half-blind concourse seemed suddenly full of tigers. Men sprang upon each other; two were killed, and a woman, dividing the polluted atmosphere with shrieks, was thrown, jumped upon, kicked and dragged into a dark side-room for dead. Then, when too late, the Law stepped in, the place was cleared, and the undiscovered woman, drunk and battered with the coming of the dawn, yielded little Tim to the world, and her own debauched spirit to the mystery of death. Of such stuff are some realities! Out of such elements was fashioned little Tim!

It seems well-nigh a pity, into what shadow so-ever the mother had gone, that he had not followed her. But he lived; a drunken negress saved him from death to a sadder fate. Into a nest of evil even more hateful than that wherein he saw his first glimmering, doubtful dawn, she carried him and all his earlier years were passed in gathering rags and bones, in stealing, and being kicked, and cuffed, and beaten. Somehow his spine was weakened; I know not if from that first dreadful hour, or by blows given afterward by those who used him much as one might the boot's toe to drive into and loosen garbage with. One could not easily have told how old he was, if the number of his years were eight or twelve, so cowed and deformed a spirit looked out of his blighted face. The yellow and green of putrid pools and gutters seemed settled in his skin, leaving it a palid olive, and his blue eyes had a cringing, frightened, furtive look.

Away at one side of the roaring city, and in a leprous hovel at the river's edge, was where the first years went over him, merciless, crushing, slow-moving in their passage. Often he turned sick when digging in the slimmering slime, and all his base surroundings swam before him; by times he fainted in his loathing and weakness, and was carried home and burned back to life again with fiery liquor. The negress held his poor life as in a vise, and her home was a place of cursing, of theft, of fighting of drunkenness. The child, like a weak worm under foot, used often to fight for his life, only to be the harder cursed. Oh! it was pityful! Yet here were thousands no better off than he; some worse; and there beyond in the beautiful city were other thousands, clothed silkenly, fed richly, and bearing no heavier burden than time and, perhaps, too much of happiness! Down into which region were the mournful eyes of the pitying Christ turned most often, think you?

But little Tim could not go on unchanged; mutation, which makes and unmakes, but yet is nature's savior, opened at last a little fissure in his life, gave him one fatal glimpse of sweet and grateful light, then shut him out in darkness.

He was ten years old then, yet, from lameness and his foster mother's cat like care, the child had never been beyond his fostering quarter, save in back alleys when gathering garbage at the misty hour of dawn, or when carried or dragged thither at night upon some thieving errand by the negress' evil friends.

They were numb with liquor that afternoon when he left this midnight mother and the white thug who was her consort, and he had been spurned into the street, where he lay a long time bruised and full of pain. Then dizzy and crying, he came away; dizzy from his hurt, and crying because he was leaving the little rag-matted hole under the stairway where he had always slept, because he was parting from the hard faces about him, the venomous creature who had starved and beaten him, and her sunken, shambling hut!

Ah, he had never known else! By day and by night, winter and summer this had been his all, his world, his home! Ponder it, you who sleep on down in chambers fragrant and lined with rose and gold! You who are all but soured with honey, was not here a soul?—your own twin-essence, starved and ruined, moving in brother-flesh across the Field of Lessons?

For a time he followed the river, limping and sobbing, and gazing through his tears into his polluted depths, as if yearning after the soft oblivion it might yield. But, when his sore feet touched the water his poor little heart was not stout enough, and he turned away, and ere long came into a beautiful avenue; then he ceased to weep wonder swept the tears from his hollow eyes. It was Sabbath—though he knew it not—and the sun was going down in a great flush of clear vermilion far away at the other end of the beauteous street, lighting a thousand soft and glimmering fires along the stately dwellings as it sank. Everywhere were flowers and exquisitely dressed children, lovely girls sitting by richly appareled men and women in costly chairs upon the porches, with rings flashing, bright rugs beneath their feet, and a background of tinted glass and splendid furnishings.

A light that was alien to the face of little Tim slowly began to illumine his pinched and pallid features; then he wavered and went back; then that look of strange desight came into his eyes again, and he hurried on as if he were entering the borders of Paradise.

Glittering carriages were rolling softly along the smooth pavement, and hundreds of women and children, clad in satin and velvet and flower-like fabrics, drifted with mingling hues along the avenue. The child forgot his rags, his bare feet, and crooked spine; the look of delight began to deepen in his eyes; then he saw that some started at him, that others scowled and pressed back their costly clothing to let him pass, and the light died out of his face, and he shrank from side to side and turned into a little park and hid.

It smelled sweet as heaven there among the blossoms, and he lay quite still on the soft grass with his poor heart fluttering. Up above him he could see the deep, serene summer sky, hung here and there with filmy loops of lace that seemed to burn with pink and crimson from the far-off sunset. It seemed to him he had never noticed it before; that his hungry eyes had always been peering into ditches and holes and filth, or blind with tears. How calm and sweet it was here where the rich dwelt!

He could hear voices here and there from vine-wound porches fronting on the little park, and one, limpid and engaging, was saying near by, "Oh, I shall go to Dr. Easman's church. Do you not think his delivery beautiful? It rests me just to look at him; he is so handsome, too!"

"Yes," said a silvery, affected voice in reply, "and he is so gentle. He is quite unreasonable about his salary, though, they say; will accept but seven thousand! It's too bad, he is so pleasant and handsome; he could surely do better than that!"

Then little Tim saw a form garbed in blue, and capped and belted, come between him and the peaceful azure of heaven, and he sprang up and ran, but was struck by a cane, and wavered and fell. But ere the officer's fat paw could secure him he was gone.

The next avenue seemed fairer than the first, and was alive with beautiful humanity flowing on toward the churches. Down this with a little thread of blood trickling from among his matted curls, he ran like a hunted human animal, and coming to a larger park hid himself again, and lay there sobbing while the shadows began to gather and huddle and group, and the clear stars swarmed into the voiceless deep above him. Then in a little time he crept away and came into the broad avenue again, going he knew not whither. A huge church was just beyond him, radiant with light and colored glass, and he drew back with fear. But at that a great wave of music went mellowing up through all the glowing structure, and the child's breath stopped and his grimy hands came together with a clutch. He had never heard other music than the banjo and drunken, ribald songs, save at long intervals the far-away playing of a band, and the soft thunder of this, the level, roll, and swell, and melting fall, drew him like a turning world.

Clinging, but palpitant, he crept into the shadows by the wide arching entrance and listened. A stream of people, jeweled, satined, and prismic under the showering light, were passing in, but he could hardly see them, his blood was throbbing so. Suddenly there was a sweet melody; a wave of human voices, strong, smooth, harmonious, that swelled and sank upon the undulating organ flood and charged the air with sympathy.

It was stronger then the ragged child; with lips parted and eyes hungry he entered. Oh! Oh! what a beautiful place! music, light, color, and fragrance! He stood bdwildered. Then suddenly he felt himself softly pushed and heard a low menacing voice bid him quit the place, and he looked up at the stately, odorous usher, and shrank out of the great doorway into the shadows again.

Then the music fell away into silence, and odors delicate and faint and sounds subdued and restful floated out the splendid doorway past the child. Then a voice came with the odors—deep, even, mellow, and handled like music. The minister was praying, but prayer to little Tim was something all unknown. Like words that were flowers it drifted by him, a long train of soft melodious clauses. He could not understand it, but he felt its beauty. The thread of humility running through it, the tender pleading, the pathos, and gentle adoration sent a great wave of loneliness across him; a kind of clear, thick darkness, an isolation that was plain, crushing medium like heavy enveloping iron. Ah, how widely he was isolated from every heart and every good! He could not comprehend why but his condition crushed in upon him like descending death, until quailing and moaning he sank beneath it and crouched in the shadow on his bare knees, with his face against the cold wall of the Father's house, he wept and struggled. Suddenly a great peal of music swept up—voices and organ-chords in a lifting, joyous flood, and the child, as if God's voice had called him, leaped in at the doorway and stood straining and wavering in the light. Only a moment he stood there, wild with a thirst for comfort, quivering to be saved; then that musky presence rose again before him, and the usher's big white hand grasped and led him to the entrance. There the stately presence muttered something, pushed him a little, and turned away, and ragged, Tim, lame, and all but blind with fright and feeling, tripped and plunged headlong down the flight of granite steps, glanced from the curving base with a cry of pain, rolled into the shadow, and lay still.

The anthem flowed on, but the child did not hear it. "We thank thee, O Lord, that thou art merciful," it pealed; "that thy strong arm doth save the righteous and confound the wicked!" and it swelled and died away. Then the pastor's lingual music came again, mellow, pleasant, perfect; round, edgeless words that wove like velvet shuttles a dissolving, beauteous fabric before his people. For an hour it rose and fell, science and revelation, linked and interfused with poetry and fine allusion; but ragged Tim, lying there in the shadow with his oozing temple on the uncushioned granite, gave no heed.

The pastor's sermon melted into silence, the glinting organ-pipes throbbed and trembled with their freight of melody again, wave after wave of blent, harmonious voices floated out upon the buoyant, billowing medium of the pipes, the benediction fell, and out the arching entrance rustled the throng, with smiles and salutations, flash of jewel and eye, soft speech and happy laughter, but the little rag-heap in the shadow made no sign.

The doorway to the fathers house was closed; sleep lapped the pastor and his people in its dreamengendering fleece; dew gathered on the wall above the fallen child, and crickets in the grass-fringe round the flag-stones rasped the silence.

The moon rode slowly over, the stars strove to take it in their silver net but lost it to the dawn; the east took fire with morning.

But little Tim slept on. No friend was there, no word of pity; only a cricket singing at his ear, and the dew trickling down the cold wall upon his piteous face, as if the very rocks shed tears for their dead.

HUNTING A BEAR.

Novel Experience of Six Ottawa Youths up the Gatineau.

About ten days ago a party of six young men rejoicing in the respective cognomens of Donald Stewart, Sandy Stewart, Timothy Harvey, Jack Harvey, Morris Quain and Isaiah Little, went about thirty-five miles up the Gatineau river for the purpose of either finding or shooting whatever came in their way. Arrived at their destination they went to the country store to lay in some supplies and there encountered a habitant in the worst stage of excitement purchasing some bullets. It was learned on enquiry from the store-keeper that the habitant, who kept a farm back about three miles, had come across a she bear and two cubs maurauding in his oat field. He had chased the bear, but on seeing him approach she stood on her hind legs and faced him. As his gun was only loaded with buckshot he fired the shot at her head and then fled, coming to the store for ammunition. The six youths were anxious for a little bear shooting, just to get their hand in, and so asked the farmer to let them go with him, which he consented to do on the express stipulation that whoever shot the bear it must be his. In due course the oat field was reached and the bear and her cubs traced to the neighboring bush. The party separated to stalk her, but just then she smelt them; the previous shot had blinded her so she could not see, and she bore down toward them. Three of the youths endeavoured to seek a friendly tree, but there was none near. Finally bruin fell to the rifle of the habitant, while the two cubs were shot by the picnicing party between them. Bears are said to be unusually numerous in that vicinity, while fish are so plentiful that they can be almost lifted out of the water wholesale by a basket.

Women and Money.

Every girl who is not entirely dependent on her male relations—a position which, considering all the ups and downs of his life, the sooner she gets out of the better—ought by the time she is old enough to possess any money to know exactly how much she has, where it is invested, and what it ought yearly to bring in. By this time also she should have acquired some knowledge of business—bank business, referring to checks, dividends, and so on—and as much of ordinary business as she can. To her information of a practical kind never comes amiss, especially the three golden rules, which have very rare exceptions: No investment of over 5 per cent. is really safe; trust no one with your money without security, which ought to be as strict between the nearest and dearest friends as between strangers; and lastly, keep all your affairs from day to day in as accurate order as if you had to die to-morrow. The mention of dying suggests another necessity—as soon as you are 21 years of age make your will. You will not die a day the sooner; you can alter it whenever you like; while the ease of mind it will be to you, and the trouble it may save to those that come after you, are beyond telling. It cannot be too strongly impressed upon every girl who has or expects that not undesirable thing, "a little income of her own," what a fortunate responsibility this is, and how useful she may make it to others. Happier than the lot of many married women is that of the "unappropriated blessing," as I have heard an old maid called, who has her money, less or more, in her own hands, and can use it as she chooses, generously as wisely, without asking anybody's leave, and being accountable for it to no one. But then she must have learned from her youth upward how to use it, and she must not spare any amount of trouble in the using of it, and she must console herself for many a lonely regret—we are but human, all of us!—with the thought that she has been trusted to be a steward of the Great Master. Such an old maid often does as much good in her generation as twenty married women.

Gloves.

Some curious customs are connected with gloves. For instance, the ceremony of removing them when entering the stable of a prince or a great man, or else forfeiting them or their value to the servant in charge. This is an odd survival of vassalage, for the removal of the glove was anciently a mark of submission. When lands or titles were bestowed, gloves were given at the same time; and, when for any reason the lands were forfeited, the offender was deprived of the right to wear gloves. The same idea was prevalent in the bestowal of a lady's glove, to be worn in the helmet of her knight, and forfeited by him if her favor ceased. In hunting the gloves are supposed to be removed to-day at the death of a stag. It was a very ancient form of acknowledgment to present a pair of gloves to a benefactor; and white gloves are still presented to the judges at maiden assizes.

HOUSEHOLD.

Household Hints.

Furniture can be brightened and cleaned from spoiled spots by rubbing with a cloth dipped in sweet oil.

Lard is said to be rendered sweet by boiling a raw pared potato in it. If it be a fact that the starch of the potato takes up the noxious qualities of impure lard, beware of frying potatoes either in bad lard or bad butter.

An improvement on the old way of making jelly is to heat the sugar before adding to the juice. Time is saved and the jelly is much clearer. After straining the juice, measure it and put on the stove to heat. Allow a pint of sugar to a pint of juice. When the juice comes to a boil, put in hot sugar. Three to five minutes' boiling will finish the jelly.

It is a too common practice in many farmers' families to burn the feathers of fowls killed for the table, under the idea that they are not worth saving. Chicken feathers are quite valuable. They do not make so soft a bed as those of the goose or duck, but are superior for pillows, where too much elasticity is not healthful or comfortable. They have, besides, too much manurial value to be wasted, being very rich in ammonia. The coarser feathers should be thrown into the manure heap, where their decomposition will add largely to its value.

And that reminds me, girls, if you want your frizzes to stay just wet them with warm castile soapsuds when you put them up. They will stay ever so much longer than when wet with clear water, and it does not injure the hair either. But you needn't friz, or bang, or crimp, or curl your front hair unless you choose. If you please you can comb your hair straight back from your forehead, and, provided that style is becoming, you will be just as fashionable as you would with the fringe of waved or frized hair in front.

Choice Recipes.

MIXED PICKLES.—One peck of green tomatoes, half a peck of onions, one pint of horse radish, half a pound of white mustard seed, half a pound of unground black pepper one ounce each of cinnamon, cloves, and turmeric, and two or three heads of cauliflower; tie the pepper, cinnamon, and cloves in a thin muslin bag; place all the ingredients in a granite-ware kettle, cover with vinegar and boil until tender; can while hot in glass fruit jars.

CHEESE STRAWS.—Take equal portions of flour; grated cheese and butter—a quarter or half a pound of each, according to the number of "straws" required; add a slight seasoning of salt and cayenne pepper; make the whole into a paste; roll out, cut into strips of straws, and bake in a quick oven.

SUET PUDDING.—Make a stiff batter of granulated Indian meal and water, with salt; add to a quart of batter half a pint of chopped suet and boil in a bag for three hours. Less will answer, but long boiling improves it. A cupful of hard cider, a cupful of molasses and a lump of butter the size of an egg makes a good sauce for the pudding.

CREAM CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one tablespoonful of butter, one-half cup of sweet milk, one egg, one and a half cups of flour, and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. This makes three layers. Take one cup of thick cream, flavor with lemon, and sweeten to taste, whip until stiff and spread between the layers and on top of the cake.

YOUNG CORN OMELET.—Strip or scrape the corn from six young full ears, pound in a yellow bowl, and mix with five eggs after they have been beaten light. Add a small saltspoon of salt and a very little pepper. Put into a hot-frying-pan equal quantities of lard and fresh butter, and stirr them well together over the fire. When they boil put in the mixture thick, and fry it, turning with care. Transfer it, when done, to a heated dish, but do not cover it over.

RICE GRIDDLE-CAKES.—Blend one cup of well boiled rice with a cup of flour, add a mall-desert-spoonful of Royal baking powder, three eggs, salt, and tablespoonful of melted butter. Reduce with one cup of rich milk, and bake on a hot, buttered griddle.

CORN BREAD.—Take a large tablespoonful of butter, one small teacupful of brown sugar, one teacupful of flour, three teacupfuls of cornmeal, a small teaspoonful of salt, a small teaspoonful of soda, two full teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, and one egg. Melt the butter, add the sugar and salt, beat well together; break the egg into it, beat until well mixed; put in the cream of tartar, add the flour and cornmeal, with sufficient milk to make a thin batter; mix steadily for about ten minutes, add the soda, still mixing. Bake in a hot oven in cake tins till well browned. Eaten warm, with butter.

BUNS, WITHOUT YEAST.—Four cups of flour one large tablespoonful butter, two-thirds cup of sugar, two teaspoonfuls extract of lemon, two heaping teaspoonfuls cream of tartar, and one rounding one of soda; or, if baking powder be used, three heaping spoonfuls; one large cup of rich milk or sweet cream, a handful of currents. Roll one inch in thickness, cut out with biscuit cutter, and bake twenty minutes in quick oven.

FRIED HALIBUT.—Place in your frying pan half a dozen slices fat, salt pork, fry brown and remove them to deep dish. Add to the fat three tablespoonfuls fresh lard; when boiling hot put in the halibut, which should be cut in pieces about three inches square and dipped in sifted meal; sprinkle with salt, fry brown, put in the dish with the pork, pour the boiling fat over, add one tablespoon boiling water, cover with a plate and let stand in the oven twenty minutes.

HYGIENE RUSK CRUMBS.—Take bits of unleaven wheaten bread, dry them thoroughly in an oven hot enough to brown slightly, but not scorch. Break them in a mortar and grind in a coffee mill. Or take a scale graham flour loaf, grate it, brown in the oven and when brittle roll fine. Serve with fruit juice or milk, allowing it to soak a few minutes before it is is eaten. Parched wheat maybe ground and eaten in the same way.

TOMATO PRESERVES.—The yellow tomato makes the nicest preserve. Scald ripe tomatoes by letting them stand one minute in boiling water, then skim them out and remove the skin. When this is done weigh them and then pour off the juice into a porcelain bottle and add a pound of sugar for each pound of tomatoes. When the [illegible] to a boil, skim and add the [illegible] boil till nearly done. Then add a [illegible] two sliced and the seed removed. If [illegible] up in jars it need not be done so [illegible] will be more healthy and palatable.

Meat or Poison.

The saying, "One man's meat is [illegible] man's poison," is well illustrated by [illegible] following instances, in which the staple [illegible] cles of one nation's diet are shown [illegible] wholly unpalatable to other tribes:

The Esquimaux near Littleton Island [illegible] discovered a supply of bread and salt [illegible] that Dr. Kane had cached, and they [illegible] ed to enjoy a feast at the white man's [illegible] pense. They liked the salt pork and [illegible] leave a morsel of it. This was probably [illegible] first chance they had ever had to vary [illegible] monotony of their meat diet. They [illegible] the bread a little, promptly pronounced [illegible] failure, and told Dr. Kane afterwards [illegible] they would as soon swallow so much [illegible] The Esquimaux generally dislike all [illegible] preparations of vegetables that the [illegible] plorers bring among them. They think [illegible] a perverted appetite that craves any [illegible] but meat.

A tribe living not far from Port Moresby, New Guinea, that think boiled snakes [illegible] be preferred to roast pig, draw the line [illegible] sugar. When they saw Dr. Chalmers, the [illegible] first white visitor, sweetening his tea [illegible] morning, they asked him for some of [illegible] salt. Dr. Chalmers told them it was [illegible] salt, but they were incredulous, and [illegible] gave some sugar to one of the natives. "[illegible] began eating it," says Dr. Chalmers, "[illegible] the look of disgust on his face was [illegible] seeing; he rose up, went out, spat out [illegible] he had in his mouth, and threw the remainder away." Then he told the crowd [illegible] horrible stuff it was, and they were satisfied to take his word for it without trying [illegible] themselves.

Many savage tribes think eggs are wholly unfit for food. They keep fowls that [illegible] very much like our own, and sometimes chickens are almost their sole animal food, but they never dreamed that any body could get hungry enough to eat eggs until they saw the missionaries eat them. The spectacle of their white friends making eggs a part of their breakfast still troubles a number of tribes in Africa. Mr. Wallace says that among some of the Pacific islanders hens' eggs are saved to sell to ships, but are never eaten by the natives.

There are a number of tribes in Africa whose chief riches are their herds of cattle, but who never drank a drop of cow's milk in their lives. They think the milk of their herds is for calves and not for human beings, and they are disgusted at the idea that any body should consider it a proper article of food. A few tribes near the great lakes think it is a spectacle worth seeing to look at the missionaries milking cows and drinking the milk. Among many tribes, however, milk is an important article of food. They estimate a man's wealth by the number of cattle he owns, and think he is squandering his capital if he kills one of them for food. They use their cattle to buy wives and other commodities, and eat them only when they die in natural course.

THE INFANT CLASS.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Sixty little smiling faces,
All in their accustom'd places;
Each a happy household's treasure
Teaching them a perfect pleasure.

Sixty pair of eyes, whose gladness
Shows no trace of care or sadness,
Are fix'd on me with glances bright,
Like twinkling orbs of purest light.

Sixty voices in a chorus:
'Childhood's years are passing o'er us;"
May those years to God be given,
Walking in the way to Heaven.

Grateful hearts are rais'd in pray'r,
Craving God's peculiar care;
Waiting for the children's blessing,
Faith and love their hearts possessing.

Childish words, brimful of trust:
"Jesus, Thou canst make us just,"
May we now and ever share
In our Father's watchful ca.e."

Now they listen to the story
Of redeeming love and glory:
How Jesus took the sinner's place,
In boundless love and matchless grace.

Simple words and illustration,
Suited to their humble station;
"Line upon line" they learn to know
The Word of God, and wiser grow.

Their minds, thus stor'd with heavenly truth,
'Twill fence them from the snares of youth,
And thus a safe foundation lay
To lead them through life's rugged way.

Oh, blessed are the children dear
Who love the Lord, and in His fear
Do walk in his most holy way
That leads to everlasting day!

And blessed s the teacher's part,
To educate the infant heart;
A Saviour's love to them unfold,
Truths ever new and never old!

The Green-Eyed Monster.

Two servant girls, who are out of employment, meet in the Park and exchange experiences.

1st servant.—"I had to leave because the lady of the house became jealous of the attentions paid me by her husband."

2nd servant.—"That wasn't the case where I was employed. I had to leave because the feller to whom I was engaged was jealous of the attentions I showed my employer."

They had a coon hunt in a Western township the other day. The coon took refuge in a tree, which was chopped down. In falling it killed two dogs, maimed another, broke the leg of one man and the collar bone of another. The coon got away.

FARM.

Scissored and Penned.

Let the pigs into the orchard if you have no other way of getting the windfalls picked up.

A poor half-cared for and overworked ram will cause weak and spindling lambs. Don't forget it.

To rush cattle into market when prices are tending downward has a tendency to lower them still more.

The use of many of the tools is over for the season and they should be housed carefully for another year.

The profits of the farm invested in permanent improvements are as surely and safely invested as if in the best savings bank.

I must say that a man with a poor farm and no money with which to buy manures, cannot do better than to collect all the night soil he can find.

The U. S. Dairyman says that the cry is that honest dairymen cannot compete with men who use cheap fat in making bogus butter. In the same way how can honest milkmen who feed pure, sweet grain, hope to compete with those who use rotten refuse or swill?

The dairyman who is most careful to furnish shelter for his cows when the cold rains and frosty nights come on, and who feeds most judiciously, never letting his cows shrink in their flow of milk unnaturally for want of food of the proper kind and proportion, is the one who will get the most product.

My idea is that fruit growers who want better prices should pay more attention to the temperance reform. Plug up the saloons, and we shall open a new market for our fruits. It is a matter of business, fruitmen. The less liquor sold, the more fruit bought.

If you have turkeys that you intend for the Thanksgiving market, be sure that you keep them growing right along; if they do not come home every night with full crops fill said crops up with grain of some kind. You can't half starve a turkey from the time it is weaned until a few weeks before market time, and then by extra feed make an extra bird of it.

If oleomargarine were pink, blue or green, or readily distinguishable in any respect from butter, dairymen could not reasonably ask protection even though its sale destroyed their business; for it could only do so because consumers preferred hog butter. The people should be protected from fraud whether they are producers or consumers.

A correspondent of the Rural New Yorker says: This year we have had all the fruit we could eat. We began with strawberries and are now eating apple sauce. We have fruit on the table at every meal; not a little taste for each one, but a regular dish. We have had no sickness. I figure that we have saved at least $20 in the meat bill since May. We are all healthy and fat. Fruit eating not only brings good temper and comfort, but it saves dollars.

In conversation with two or three farmers within the past week, one claimed that it cost over two dollars a ton to harvest his hay crop; the second presented figures to show that the total expense was but a trifle over one dollar; while with the third the expense was stated to be between three and four dollars. These figures simply illustrate the cost of doing business under different systems, or want of systems. After all that has been said, there is not the attention given to the cost of growing and harvesting that there should be. We have not yet learned the economy of farming, or that in order to compete successfully the business must be systematized.

The Pig-Feeding That Pays.

Every farmer, says Thomas D. Baird, who makes the feeding of animals an important part of his business ought to know that their unremitting growth is the only right way of treating them. This is the course which the most successful pork-raisers pursue in feeding their hogs regularly and fully through winter and summer till they are sufficiently fat in autumn. To fatten hogs to the best advantage the pig should be fed and managed with regard to a rapid and continued growth. I know of no better way than to sow rye in the fall for early spring pasture. More than a month can be gained in this way, for the rye comes on early, while clover is slow to start, and should not be turned on until in blossom. After this it would be well to turn them in a clover field where there is plenty of pure fresh water, and give an additional feed of sweet milk, wheat bran, and cornmeal. Pigs managed in this way have their bone and muscular frame well built up, their appetites strong, their health vigorous, their digestive powers active, and their ability to assimilate all they can digest as strong as it can be. Now the pig is in good condition for forcing in the fattening process.

Many intelligent persons suppose that poor animals may in a short time be changed into fat ones by stuffing them with rich food. I have seen farmers who supposed the more food they could get their hogs to eat in a day or a week the faster they would gain, become discouraged because the gain was not in proportion to the food consumed and in their disappointment come to the conclusion that fattening hogs did not pay, when the true reason was they were overfed and excess of food was wasted. A farmer may withhold the proper quantity of food from his hogs and even half starve them for months and then glut them with excessive food and thus hope rapidly to put them in a fat condition. But careful observations prove that the profits of raising and fattening hogs are realized only when they are regularly fed from day to day with neither too scant nor too heavy rations. Some object to this mode; they wish to finish the fattening in two or three months and think it is too expensive to continue it for one or two years. Heavy feeding is not requisite to keeping up the continued growing condition of an animal.

FREAKS OF ELECTRICITY.

Remarkable Phenomena Attending the Eruption of Mount Tarawera.

Among the many extraordinary natural phenomena attending the eruption of Mount Tarawera, one which appears to me not the least singular has been passed over in comparative silence and without exciting comment, as far as I am aware, among the scientific or unscientific public. I allude to the fact of their being unable to make water boil on that terrible night, when earth itself appeared to be in a state of ebullition. I give here the narrative from Mr. McRae's own lips:

"'Come here, sir.'

"'What is it?' said I.

"'I can't get the water to boil,' he said.

"'Tut,' said I; 'poke up the fire.'

"'It's a good fire,' he replied, and so it was, a glowing fire of blazing rata logs—a splendid fire. 'Put your hand in there and feel it,' said he, taking the lid off the boiler.

"I did so, very gingerly, I can assure you, and found the water as cold as when we put it on. There were so many extraordinary things happening around me that this particular one did not excite my wonder very much. I thought it was owing to the electricity in the air. George Baker can vouch, as well as myself, for the fact of the water having been on the fire for full three-quarters of an hour, and at the end of that time being as cold as when it was put on. We spoke of the circumstance to the others at the time as being curious, but soon had matters more serious to distract our attention."

Now, surely here is a natural phenomenon worthy the investigation of all our scientific men, not only in New Zealand, but throughout the civilized world. We of course all know that the greater the atmospheric pressure the greater the number of units of heat required to make the water boil, but some other deterrent cause must have been at work in this instance, as after having been placed for three-quarters of an hour on a good fire the water remained absolutely cold. What other cause was there? is the problem I suggest to our scientific men as one well worthy of their research.

On the night of the Tarawera eruption the Haszard family had in their cash box, among other moneys, a half-sovereign lying on the top of four half crowns. During the storm which burst over their devoted residence the building was struck by lightning. On digging out the effects the working party handed over the cash box to the friends of the Haszard family. Mr. John P. Morpeth of Ponsonby, at whose house Mrs. Haszard has been staying, has now in his possession the half sovereign and four half crowns, which form a perfect curiosity. The lightning appears to have fused the coins together, and in some mysterious way, though the face of the half sovereign is not defaced, the gold appears to have been driven through the centre of each of the half crowns, as each in the centre is colored the size of a shilling as if with gold. As a souvenir of the Tarawera eruption it is one of the most remarkable that has yet been exhibited.

The great reputation of Briggs' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves.

Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Eclectric Oil," Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgias Sprains and Bruises, complaints arrising from Cold, such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

Rev. Mr. Cornish has announced two special sermons for next Sunday. In the morning on "Womens' Work for Jesus," and in the evening "The Temperance War Cry." These are topics of great importance to the Christian Church, and all interested therein are invited to be present.

The Rev. A. J. Parker, of Priceville, rejoices in the possession of a new parsonage. The congregation there are to be congratulated on having one of the best parsonages on the District. Conveniently situated near the church. It is a credit to the village and the Methodist people. On last Friday a tea-meeting was held there in aid of the parsonage building fund. Rev. Mr. Cornish assisted in adding interest to the occasion by giving them a telling address on "Methodism—its Chief Characteristics." The choir, under the leadership of Dr. Hickson, did great credit to themselves in their excellent selections and the way in which they were rendered. Owing to the stormy weather and bad roads the attendance was small. Nearly all the funds necessary, however, to liquidate the debt has been provided.—Com.

Fatal Accident.—Our citizens were shocked by the news which spread around town yesterday afternoon of a dreadful accident which had just occurred near the mouth of the river. It appears that Mr. F. Spurgeon Brown went down there to shoot ducks in company with Mr. Smith, a commercial traveller. Mr. Smith got out of the boat and went along the shore, while Mr. Brown kept in the shallow water of the marsh presently a shot was heard, and Mr. Smith, looked over, found that Mr. Brown had fallen out of the boat. He had been reaching for his gun and caught hold of it by the muzzle, when it went off, tearing away a portion of his hand, and lodging the contents in his abdomen, and caused him to fall out. Mr. Smith at once rushed to his assistance, and got him out of the water, after which he was conveyed to Dr. Cameron's office, and from thence home. Although he was quite conscious and spoke to those around him, his wounds were of such a character that there was no hope of his recovery, and he died at two o'clock Thursday morning. Mr. Brown has been for several years past employed during summer season as assistant in the Custom House, and was well known and highly popular amongst the young men of the town. His parents and family have the sympathy of our citizens generally in their very sad bereavement. —[Owen Sound Times. [Deceased taught school a few years ago in this neighborhood and was very popular. Ed S.

Head che Biliousness—"Whenever I feel out of sorts, bilious, my liver not working right, or racked with a headache I take Chase's Liver Cure, There is more real benefit from one dose of your Liver Cure than in many bottles of some medicine,"—John MsNasser Bond Head.

Pay the Printer.

An exchange tells its readers how to mind their "p's" in the following paragraph: Persons who patronize papers should pay promptly, for the pecuniary prospects of the press have a peculiar power in pushing forward public prosperity. If the printer is paid promptly and his pocket book kept phletorie by prompt paying patrons he puts his pen to the paper in peace, his paragraphs are more pointed, he paints his pictures of passing events in pleasant colors and the perusal of his paper is a pleasure to the people. Paste this bit of proverbial philosophy in some place where all persons can perceive.

This is to certify that I have used McGregors Speedy Cure for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint, and do honestly say that if it cost me one hundred ($100.00) a bottle I would not be without it, as it has done me more good than all the medicines I ever used, and I feel like a new man.—Yours truly, Alex. Steel, Carleton Place, Ont. This medicine is for sale at 50c. and $1.00 per bottle at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store. 1

Young Peoples' Concert.—The weather was most unfavorable on Wednesday evening last, yet a good number turned out to the entertainment. The young folk had evidently made great preparations both in fitting up the stage and getting up a difficult and elaborate programme. Many of the plays were well performed, calling forth the hearty applause, and repeated laughter of the audience. Owing to the downpour of rain during the evening together with the size of the room (the rink) made it difficult to hear as well as act. Mr. Isaac Chambers gave two songs in French which were well given and highly appreciated: He has an excellent voice.

Many of the Characters, and plays deserve special mention, but time will not permit. The financial result was satisfactory.

HEALTH.

Fatigue and Indigestion.

The following wise remarks are quoted from Health, an English monthly devoted to scientific hygiene :

"A cause of imperfect digestion is fatigue. When we start on a walk it does not matter much whether the road is rough or not ; any litt'e obstacle is avoided with ease and we thread our way over rough stones, through tangled heath, or over a quaking bog, without difficulty. Our nervous system is in full vigor, and preserves perfect co-ordination among the movements of the different parts of the body; so that one helps the other, and all difficulties are surmounted. But when we are tired a little roughness in the road will cause us to stumble, and an unexpected stone may give us a sudden fall. The wearied nervous system no longer co-ordinates the movements of the various parts of the body, that they may work together for a common end.

"The same thing occurs with the various parts of the intestinal canal. If the nervous system is exhausted by previous fatigue, or debilitated by illness, the requisite co-ordinations may not take place, and biliousness or indigestion may be the result. How often do we find the meal taken by a person immediately after a long railway journey disagrees with him, and either causes sickness or diarrhœa, or a bilious headache? Forty winks after dinner is not always a bad thing ; but forty winks before dinuer is certainly much better.

"How often do men who have worked hard all day, with their mental faculties constantly on the stretch, go home and have dinner forthwith ! Exhausted as they are, how can they eat? They ought to make a point of having a little rest at home before dinne:.

"There is grave truth in these remarks, and they should be well laid to heart by those who are compelled to work at high pressure, and thus fail in that repair of the bodily waste which lies at the foundation of health. But mental emotions and the play of mind may in their turn produce disturbances of the body's duties in the way of food digestion. Here, again, the views expressed teem with a common sense and philosophy which commend them to the thorough appreciation of those who find digestion to fail from the nervous influences that chase one another and career over the surface of the mental atmosphere.

"Effects, somewhat similar to those of fatigue, may be produced by depressing or disturbing mental emotion, or bodily conditions. We know how readily excitement of almost any kind will destroy the appetite of some people, and depressing emotions will do it.

"From this it would seem to be equally probable that various emotions affect special parts of the digestive system. A strong impression of disgust may excite vomiting; compassion is said to produce movements of gas in the small intestine ; worry is know to affect the liver ; and Dr. Brunton gives some countenance to the popular notion that jaundice may be brought on through a mental cause, illustrated for example, by anxiety. The old adage respecting the wisdom of maintaining an easy mind if we would grow fat, has therefore a physical basis. It is the surest of inferences that the mind and nervous system which are allowed to remain placid and unruffled, are most likely to be found presiding over a body and processes which respectfully live and act in a healthy and normal fashion. If care really kills us, it seems probable that its method of slaughter is largely that of destroying the harmony of those functions on which the proper nutrition of our bodies depend."

A Wet Sheet Pack

This valuable process in water treatment may be briefly described as follows : Have ready two or three comfortables or thick blankets, one woolen blanket and a large linen or cotton sheet. It is important to be certain that the sheet is sufficiently large to extend twice around the patient's body. More blankets are required in cool weather than in warm, although the pack should be taken in a room at temperate heat. Spread upon a bed or straight, broad lounge the comfortables, one by one, making them even at the top. Over them spread the woolen blanket, allowing its upper edge to fall an inch or two below that of the last comfortable. Wet the sheet in water of the proper temperature, wring out so that it will not drip, then gather the ends so that it can be quickly spread out. Now place its upper end even with the woolen blanket, and spread it out on each side of the middle sufficiently to allow the patient to lie down on his back, which he should quickly do, letting his ears come just above the upper border of the sheet, and extending his limbs near together. Wrap the patient snugly, carefully first with the sheet and afterward with the blanket, taking care to exclude air from the neck to the toes. After the bath give the patient a cool or tepid sponge bath, or a wet sheet rub, and he will probably feel greatly refreshed and invigorated. This form of bath is particularly useful in diseases of a ferbrile type.

Salt and Digestion.

If a piece of salt is taken into the mouth, the flow of saliva is temporarily increased, though it is not certain that the amount secreted in any given time is any greater than it would have been had no stimulants been used. It has been argued, also, that the effect of salt on the gastric juice in the stomach is the same, and that its use promotes digestion. Some recent experiments, however, on a man who had an artifical opening into his stomach to supply food, which he could not take through the mouth, seems to negative this assumption, and that salt hinders the secretion of gastric juice and digestion rather than promotes them. If the amount of salt is considerable, digestion almost ceases. Experiments like these have great value, for they help to clear away the superstitions of past ages, which seem to be held by the educated and the ignorant alike.

Diphtheria.

M. Delthil, of Paris, has become famous for his success in the cure of this disease. Large flat dishes, filled with spirits of turpentine, are placed in different parts of the room ; sponges wet with it are placed at each side of the patient's head, and it is even used to swab the throat. M. Delthil claims for this treatment sixty recoveries out of sixty-three cases, where it was instituted and carried out from the beginning of the disease.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"Heah am a petishun to de nex' Legislachur', signed by twenty-eight cull'd men of Battle Creek," said Brother Gardner, as silence fell upon Paradise Hall. "It am a petishun prayin' dat body to restore capital punishment. I hope dat ebery member of dis club will add his signatur' to it. If dar am one fing more dan anoder wanted in de Stait of Michigan to-day it am a hangman who understands his bizness. De want of sich a man, together with juries who won't permit deir sympathies to run away wid deir common sense, am bein' felt to-day in almost ebery county in de Stait. De number of cold-blooded murders an' attempts at murder foot up a total to surprise you. We stand among de foremost in de record, an' it am evident to all observers dat nuffin am am held mo' cheaply in Michigan dan human life. We hev sent men to prison fur life fur murder, but dey am libin' on in hopes of a new trial an' a verdict in deir favor.

"Let de petishun be signed an' returned. If it doan' do any good dis club will stan' ready to jine itself to a vigilance committee. It really doan' make so much difference whether a murderer am hung by de Sheriff or a blacksmith. De main pint, arter you am sartin of his guilt, am to hev him well hung by de neck. We will now take up de miscellaneous bizness an' seek to cl'ar off de Secretary's desk."

GIVEADAM IS THREATENED.

Giveadam Jones notified the meeting that he was in receipt of the following letter, dated at Halifax and written in blood-red ink :

It has been decreed, by virtue of the Grand Council, that you shall meet your doom by the hands of our Worthy Grand Assassin. So by faith shall it come to pass as we say it. R. G. & S.

We are desirous that you should have time to give thoughts to your soul's best wishes. The Grand Deliverer of Orders shall in course notify yon of the date fixed for your journey to the mysterious destination of your kind. You will therefore prepare for the promised future. G.

The Grand Scriptorial Deliver will do duty to your soul's wishes.

By order,
LAZZIE,
R. W. G. Fiend Lodge 444.

The letter reached his cabin during his temporary absence, and his wife opened and read it. When he came home he found her unconscious, and for three days her life was despaired of. He had been greatly worried himself, sometimes being inclined to flee to the West.

"Brudder Jones, you stay right heah," replied the President. "In de fust place, we can't spar' you, an' in de next place, if you am assassinated you shall hev a funeral to be proud of. It may be dat you am marked as a victim, but I wouldn't worry over it. Jist put a pa'r o' brass knuckles in your pocket an' keep your eyes peeled o' nights, de assassin who tackles you will think a brick house has hit him on de neck."

DON'T TRUST HIM.

The Secretary annouced the following :

SISSONVILLE, KANAWHA Co., W. VA.

Brother Gardner.

DEAR SIR—At a meeting of "Whitewash Club" No 7201 I was directed to inquire of your Recommendation Committee whether or no they had given Brother Col. Andy Ray a certificate of moral reputation. He is canvassing our community with a windmill. Already he owes Brother Jenks two weeks' board, and Brother Sam Jones, the barber, has refused to shave him until we hear from you. He claims that the "mill" will blow lime out'n of a whitewasher's eyes, and all seeds cleaned, from a mustard up to a large sized 'tater. As you have been sitting under the dripping of lectures on cyclones and other wind currents, we desire your advice before purchasing. We number sixty-three members, and all belong to the Baptist Church except fifty-nine. It's time to suspect something when a man weighing 187 pounds lays down his whitewash brush and goes into the wind business.

P. HENRY FLOYD, Sec'y.

The Secretary was instructed to reply that the club had no knowledge of any such man as Col. Andy Ray, nor did it desire to express an opinion on his invention. While he passed as an individual the club would not go out of its way to whack him, but in case he claimed membership, or pretended that his mill was indorsed by the club, his sorrows and tribulations would begin at once.

The thanks of the club are also due to "G. G.," of Alabama, who has forwarded a hair brush said to be 4,500 years old.

A NEW POEM.

The receipt of the following touching poem was announced, and Waydown Bebee was authorized to set the same to music :

HI DAR ! CHIPMONK.

BY SALAMANDER SMIFFIN.

A chipmonk sat on a hick'ry limb,
Hi did a di, hi did a di,
A rabbit come 'long an' he say to him,
"Hi did a di, did a da."

Rabbit :

"I see you is sittin' up dar all day,
Hi did a di, hi did a di,
Why for de debil you up dar stay ?
Hi did a di, did a da."

Chipmonk :

"Oh ! dem hick'ry nuts, day am so sweet,
Hi did a di, hi did a di,
An' I sittin' up here dem for to eat,
Hi did a di, did a da."

Samuel Shin was then fined $450 for breaking two lamp-chimneys with his elbow while throwing a paper wad at Elder Toots and the meeting adjourned.

Ill Temper

Is more rapidly improved by relief from physical suffering than in any other way. Step on your friend's corn, and the impulse to strike is strongest. Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor, by quickly and painlessly removing them, insures good nature. Fifty imitations prove its value. Beware of substitutes. "Putnam's," sure, safe, painless.

Charge it to Wiggins.

Do you know that there were very many people in Buffalo—not ignorant and superstitious, but educated and of rather good nerves—who were quite worried and alarmed by Wiggins' prediction of a general shaking up of our planet on that Wednesday ? It is difficult to believe it, but it is none the less true. It is told of a lady whose reputation for strong-mindedness is rather wide that she actually called upon her pastor and had to be prayed with before her terrors could be subdued. More than one clergyman, if report be true, had to reason with members of his flock to convince them that the day of wrath was not actually at hand, and that Wiggins could have no such exclusive information as to the coming of earthquakes as has been claimed by him.

Where Are You Going?

If you have pain in the back, pale and sallow complexion, bilious or sick headache, eruptions on the skin, coated tongue, sluggish circulation, or a hacking cough, you are going into your grave if you do not take steps to cure yourself. If you are wise you will do this by the use of Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery," compounded of the most efficacious ingredients known to medical science for giving health and strength to the system through the medium of the liver and the blood.

Old-fashioned hoopskirts are already worn by ladies who "have just returned from Europe."

Sick and bilious headache, and all derangements of stomach and bowels, cured by Dr. Pierce's "Pellets"—or anti-bilious granules. 25 cents a vial. No cheap boxes to allow waste of virtues. By druggists.

The new style of arranging the hair gives a good chance to display ornamental hairpins.

Life seems hardly worth the living to-day to many a tired, unhappy discouraged woman who is suffering from chronic female weaknesses for which she has been able to find no relief. But there is a certain cure for all the painful complaints to which the weaker sex is liable. We refer to Dr. Pierce's "Favorite Prescription" to the virtues of which thousands of women can testify. As a tonic and nervine it is unsurpassed. All druggists.

Embroidered crapes, muslins, and batistes are in beautiful designs for evening dresses.

Don't use any more nauseous purgatives such as Pills, Salts, &c., when you can get in Dr. Carson's Stomach Bitters, a medicine that moves the Bowels gently, cleansing all impurities from the system and rendering the Blood pure and cool. Great Spring Medicine 50 cts.

Life is short—only four letters in it. Three-quarters of it is a "lie" and half of it is an "if."

A Free Fight.

The great reputation of Briggs' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves.

Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Eclectric Oil," Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same ; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgias Sprains and Bruises, complaints arrising from Cold, such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

It was all very well—Soda water!—it was all very well when I was in commission as captain of one of the ships in ordinary that were to be some day in active service. No, Seltzer water!—I won't have this. Simmons!"

"Yes, sir!"

"You are a fool!"

"Yes, sir!"

"Be off! As I was saying—let me see what I was saying—well, what is the use of having a great uncle at the Admiralty? Sir Marmaduke said to me: 'Charles, you have rather committed yourself about that little racing affair, and the substitution of that bay, Tippoo Sahib, for the Light of Morn,' said he. 'And you must go and do something out of the way to make folks forget it. There's a smuggler and pirate and wrecker and all that sort of thing that Sir Thomas Clifford, the admiral of the port at Falmouth, is always bothering us to commission something specially to hunt down. You go—do it! Ah!'"

"Yes, sir!"

"Well, there was a row!"

"Yes, I refused—dem! Point-blank refused, and that same night a low, mechanical fellow; a tinker, or tailor, or candlestick maker, or something of that sort, he got up in the House of Commons and he asked the First Lord of the Admiralty if he could tell him whether or not the Honorable Charles Minto Grey was still in commission as a post-captain in his majesty's navy, after the recent expose of the swindling transactions at the last Leger!"

"Oh! did he say that, sir?"

"The very words—shocking!"

"Scan-dalous—hem!"

"Well, my noble relative, the First Lord, he got up and he said that the young and gallant officer—meaning me—had been, for a moment, the dupe of designing people, but that with his characteristic gallantry and nice sense of honor, he had—meaning me—at once given up his command of the Orion and had volunteered to go in a schooner and rid the Channel of one of the most daring and blood-thirsty pirates that had ever appeared upon the coasts of Great Britain—meaning me."

"You—the pi—"

"Dem, no! The volunteer."

"Oh, yes, sir!"

"Well, then, all the treasury hacks and the government men cried, 'Hear, hear! 'Loud cheers,' said the Times, next morning. And that was the way I was, so to speak, pitchforked into this precious affair. Ah! More seltzer water—no champagne—still? Be quick, will you? Ah, it's a fatiguing life this, Green, and I don't know where to look for pirates and those sort of annoyances. Now, what on earth is that for?"

The rapid discharge of a couple of guns above on the deck of the Spray disturbed the equanimity of the Honorable Charles Minto Grey, and then the voice of Mr. Royle was heard in almost shrieking vehemence, shouting:

"Cutter ahoy? Heave to, or I'll sink you! Who and what are you?"

"The Rift, smuggler and pirate?" roared a voice in answer.

The Honorable Charles Minto Grey stepped from the sofa on the floor of his cabin and Mr. Green ran to the hatchway.

Then there was a sharp, ringing report, and crash through the oval light of the cabin of the Spray there came a six-pound shot, which passed over the head of the honorable captain and smashed a mirror, in which he had been in the habit of admiring himself, on the opposite side of the cabin.

"Good day!"

"Fire!" roared Mr. Royle, and there was a volley from the whole six guns which had been shipped on board the schooner for the special service she was on.

The smoke mingled with the fog, and for about five minutes enveloped the Spray in an impenetrable mist. When that in some measure cleared away, there was nothing visible, however faintly, through the vapory air, of the Rift.

"Make sail!" cried Mr. Royle. "If it's to be Falmouth, let us be after him. These rascals often speak the truth in bravado, thinking, when they name a port, that that will be the last place to which you will follow them. Give her full way."

The Spray was a fast schooner, and but that she was a little overladen with her metal, would have sailed well on a wind, such as she now took advantage of; but even as she was, she sped through the water at a respectable speed.

The pirate lugger had disappeared. Had the mists or the waves swallowed her up?

CHAPTER V.

A FAIR YOUNG LIFE RESCUED FROM THE WAVES.

Captain Dolan, when he flung the French captain with so little ceremony through the half open skylight, was not at all unmindful of the fact that Gerald was in the cabin, but situated as he was with the boy, he did not concern himself whether he heard a little more or a little less of the peculiar business of the Rift.

In fact, as his avowed object in bringing the boy on the voyage at all was to commit him to the common guilt of the cutter's crew, it was not likely that he would strive to hide anything from him.

The French captain had been so completely taken by surprise that he had not made the least effort of resistance, but fell on the table in the cabin as if it had been an act of his own. It was only for a few moments, however, that he was thus mentally stunned by the treachery of Captain Dolan.

Springing to his feet, with a shout of anger, he made a dash at the skylight to regain the deck; but the wooden covering that was placed over it on the moment, by the crew of the Rift, defeated him, and then he dashed up the hatchway, but that was secured, so that Captain Mocquet was a veritable prisoner.

It was then that, after striking his breast several times in his despair, he observed by the light that came dubiously in from the [illegible]yelike [illegible] that he was not alone.

Rather pale, with his hand resting on the side of the cabin table, stood poor Gerald.

Had Captain Mocquet—who was a foe to revenue, both of France and England, but by no means anything else but one of the kindest hearted and noblest men breathing—been in his ordinarily observant and cool condition, he must have seen at a glance that Gerald could be in no way concerned, except as a sufferer, with Dolan and his crew. But Captain Mocquet was thrown off his balance by the treatcherous act of which he had been the victim, and there was despair at his heart, for fortune, life, and what to him was more than either or both, was now at stake.

"Voleur! what you say, villain, pirate? One life, one life!"

He drew from the breast of his apparel a small pistol, and Gerald felt the cold muzzle of the weapon touch his forehead, while Captain Mocquet glared fiercely at him. The smile with which Gerald regarded him was so sweet and yet so full of sadness that the arm of the French captain slowly dropped, as he said faintly.

"Et vous?"

Gerald shook his head.

"Ah! vous ne parlez pas Francais. I shall spoke English. You too—you too—you are one prisonnier!"

"I am."

Captain Mocquet immediately embraced Gerald, and then a voice from the deck of the Rift cried out:

"Don't be too quick over it, mates—she'll soon fill and go down!"

For a moment the French captain seemed to be trying those words in different ways, to see if he could extract any other meaning from them than that which seemed obviously upon their surface. Then with a shriek of agony, he flew upon the hatchway and beat with his clenched hands upon the wooden covering.

"Non—non—no! Pitie—what you say—mercy! My Marie—mercy! Oh, non, non! What you call to give all, all, pour ma Marie? Mercy, mercy!"

Not the remotest attention was paid to the shrieks and prayers of Captain Mocquet who then, with hands bleeding and such a look of despair and agony upon his face that it was awful to see it, half fell, half staggered back into the cabin, and flinging himself on the floor he placed the pistol to his head:

"Adieu, adieu! ma belle France! Adieu, ma chere belle! ma belle, mon ange: Adieu, adieu!"

"Stop, sir!" said Gerald, as he snatched the pistol from Captain Mocquet's hands. "What would you do, sir? Don't you know that the good God would be displeased with you?"

"Le bon Dieu!"

"Yes, I know that much French. You are a man, sir, and should not be cast down to kill yourself because Dolan and the crew of the Rift are thieves and bad men."

"No, no. But you don't know; vous shall know my child (I cannot spoke de Anglaise well), my child, my Marie. She will kill on board one Coquette. Oh, you shall know. She is si belle, so beautiful, she sleep so unsuspect comme un ange, and she and de wild sea roll, roll over one head of my dear little child. Mercy! mercy! No mother, no mother, no father to say live and I will die for you, my Marie.

With tears, and sobs and frantic cries, Captain Mocquet then explained to Gerald that his little daughter was on board the Coquette and would be drowned in the vessel on its being sunk by Dolan and his crew, as it seemed to be their manifest intention to do. At the thought the image of his own dear sister Grace, who was the one being that he loved, and who made up that one charm and tie that held him to life with a beautiful hope and a happiness even in the midst of all else that spoke of harshness and misery, came up before the mind's eye of Gerald and he felt deeply for the despair of poor Captain Mocquet.

"Sir, sir!" he said, "tell me as plainly as you can. Do you mean to say that your little daughter is on board the Coquette?"

"Oui, yes: my child! my child!"

"Good Heavens! They do not, they cannot know it."

Gerald rushed up the hatchway and knocked as loudly as he could against it to attract attention; and then with a voice that should have been heard even above all the bustle upon the decks of the two vessels, incidental to the transfer from the Coquette to the Rift of every portable article which any of the crew of the latter took a fancy to, he shouted:

"Martin! Martin! Ben Bowline! Hoy! On board the Coquette is Captain Mocquet's little daughter—a child, a child, Martin! Martin! you don't want to murder the little child—Captain Mocquet's child. Do you hear me? Save her! Save her! Martin—on board the lugger—a child on board. Save her! Save her! and Ben Bowline! Help, help, help!"

He beat furiously against the hatchway covering; but with as much effect might he have appealed to the raging sea to give up its dead—for not the remotest attention was paid to him.

Weak, and faint, and exhausted, then Gerald staggered back to the cabin.

"It is all in vain!—it is all in vain!"

The French captain flung himself upon his knees and with tears streaming down his face began to pray.

"All on board, clear away!" shouted the voice of Captain Dolan. "She is sinking—clear away! fore and aft there, keep all clear!"

"Ay, ay, sir!" shouted the crew.

Then Captain Mocquet uttered a scream and fell upon his face.

Gerald felt as if his own heart had paused in its action at that moment, and he was then alarmed by the French captain suddenly springing to his feet and making a rush at the little oval opening that served as a window to the cabin. It was fastened by a screw and the wash of the sea each moment splashed upon the piece of thick, greenish glass that was let into the little frame.

It was evident that Captain Mocquet was seized with a desire to get out of the Rift by that opening, and it was equally evident that it was far too small for any such purpose.

Then there came a cry upon the air and there was a commotion on the surface of the water.

The cry was the voice of Marie Mocquet. The commotion was the [illegible] of the Coquette.

Then a thought came over Gerald, and while his eyes flashed with a new light that made him look something more than mortal, he cried:

"Who shall say—God, who shall say? It may be the will of Heaven, sir, that your child should yet be saved, and that I, even I, may be chosen as its instrument. You cannot pass through the window, but I can. I swim well. Let me go—let me go!"

It was but imperfectly that Captain Mocquet comprehended all that Gerald said, but he understood enough of it to be aware that he meant to make some effort to save his daughter's life and he held him to his heart for one moment.

"Go! go!" he sobbed. "Go!"

Lithe and active, slim and tall for his age, Gerald found no difficulty in projecting his feet through the window, and in at once gliding into the sea.

It had been the favorite pastime of Gerald from the earliest years he could remember himself as an inmate of the house of Captain Dolan, among the rocks and cliffs, to play in the sea as though it had been his native element, and he was thoroughly and fully at home in the water.

The thick, white fog that had floated over the channel and the Rift and the Spray and the Coquette and the Nautilus, from the coast of France, lay heavily upon the sea and was slowly making its way into the cabin of the Rift. The waves were washing to and fro with a slow, heaving motion, and the smuggling vessel was making at that moment but slow progress through the water.

"Here, here!" whispered Captain Mocquet; and the light splash of a rope in the water close to him let Gerald know what he meant. The boy coiled it once around him and so was able to keep up with the Rift. While gently beating the water with his feet, he gazed as well as he could through the fog over the surface of the sea.

"Lost, lost!" he said. "The Frenchman's child has gone down with the Coquette!"

Even as he spoke, a something glided past him on the top of a wave—half on the top of it and half below it—rolling over and over, and looking like anything but a human form, amid the fog and the light ocean spray that was about it.

Gerald was impressed with the idea that it was some little child he was to look for; but this did not come up to that notion; and when, upon dashing the salt ooze from his eyes, he felt confident that it was a human form that was rapidly floating away from him, he did not think it was the fair girl who had spoken those few words we have recorded, to the villain Dolan, and who was the life and hope of poor Captain Mocquet's heart.

But still, that the object in the water was human, he now felt assured, so Gerald struck out for it.

And now a circumstance that neither he nor Captain Mocquet had calculated upon very nearly proved the complete destruction of Marie. Mocquet had found in the cabin of the Rift the rope he had flung to Gerald, and he had lashed the end of it firmly to a ring in the paneling of the cabin. Now, however, Gerald found that he was suddenly brought up by this rope, and that the white-looking object in the water was floating away from him rapidly, while he could not advance another inch in pursuit of it.

"Cast off the rope!" he would fain have said; but his words would easier have reached the crew of the Rift, busy as they all were, then the ears of Captain Mocquet. So Gerald had only to make a struggle in the water to get the rope from around him, which was no easy task, wet and tight as it had got.

After several efforts, however, Gerald did slip the rope over his head, and was free. Then, with vigorous strokes, he swam after the floating white object in the water; and as he went with the same current that carried it, and swam likewise, he soon overtook it; and flinging one arm around it, he strove to raise the face of the young girl from the waves, in order that if the lungs had not yet ceased to play, they might inhale fresh life from the free air.

She did not move.

"Dead!" gasped Gerald, "Dead!"

He then looked for the Rift.

It was at that time that Captain Dolan had ordered the first change in the course of the vessel, and that change had the effect of bringing it each succeeding moment nearer and nearer to Gerald, who found no difficulty in keeping his place in the water, although he might have found it an impossible task to swim after the Rift, burdened with the apparently dead body of Marie Mocquet, which he still supported on his left arm.

It was with a strange sort of rush that he heard rather than saw through the fog the Rift coming down upon him; and in fact it was with no small difficulty that he kept clear of her cut-water; and she rushed along past him at what looked like great speed, as he was floating at an angle in the other direction.

(TO BE CONTINUED).

A Palace Tragedy.

M. Maspero added an incident of a peculiarly horrible character to the story of the unwrapping of the royal mummies of Deir-el-Bahari. Among them was found the body of a young man between 25 and 30 years of age, bearing neither name nor inscription of any kind, which is by itself an extraordinary circumstance. Instead of having been embalmed in the usual way the body had merely been dried by some skillful process, without removing any of the internal organs, and had been covered with a thick layer of some mixture at once fatty and caustic. Above all, the attitude of the corpse, its bent legs, its feet turned against each other, its clenched hands, the expression of its face—all combined to indicate that the unknown person had died in extreme agony.

At first M. Maspero was tempted to suspect that he had come across a case of the embalmment of a living man—a form of murder which is not difficult to reconcile with Egyptian usage. Medical men, however, who had been consulted, were disposed, rather to recognize the symptoms of poisoning. In any case, we are brought face to face with a palace tragedy, for a body found among the royal mummies of Deir-el-Bahari can hardly be other than that of a princely personage.

WOMEN'S DOINGS.

Queen Victoria's chicken house is a palatial, semi-gothic building.

Mrs. Cleveland, it is remarked, has an excellent memory of names.

Mrs. Wm. H. Vanderbilt is said to receive about 100 begging letters daily.

Katie Putnam, the actress, has an annual income of $10,000 from her fruit farm in Michigan.

Lady Randolph Churchill goes to the ladies' gallery of the House of Commons almost every day.

Minnie Palmer, having completed her tour of Ireland, has sailed for Australia for a nine-months' engagement.

Chung Sing, the Chinese doctor of Pueblo, is very sad over the death of his wife, for whom he had recently paid $2,000.

The Duchess of Cambridge, who is verging on ninety, is still in good health and preservation. She takes as great an interest in affairs as the best of the young ones.

Sara Bernhardt will round the Horn for Chili and Peru, thence she will cross the Isthmus and visit Cuba and Mexico. Great woman, Sara; thin, but plucky.

Miss Belva Lockwood has developed into a pugilist of no mean pretensions. She threw a troublesome client out of the window of her law office in Washington the other day.

Miss Ellen Terry is reported to have a wonderful dog. She holds in her hands two biscuits, and calls one Clito and the other Faust. The bow-wow eats the Faust and leaves the Clito.

The widow of John B. Gough has received at her home in Boylston a letter of condolence from the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars in New South Wales.

Running stage routes is a favorite occupation with women in the free and boundless West. A maiden of 15 owns the stage (and drives the horses herself) that connects Hamline and Milnor, Dak.

Princess Ana Murat, now Duchess of Mouchy, is by birth an American, her native place being Bordentown, N. J. She was born in 1841, and is still regarded as one of the handsomest women in France.

The fortune of the late Comtesse de Chambord exceeded fifteen million dollars, the greater part of which came to her from the Duke of Modena. The mother of Don Carlos inherited one-half of the duke's fortune.

Mrs. George E. Cooke, of Louisville, Ky., is spending her spare time embroidering a superb altar-cloth for Calvary church, Louisville, the pastor of which is Mr. Minnigerode, son of the noted Doctor Minnigerode, of Richmond, a cousin of Prince Bismarck.

An African Princess is living in Hanover county, Virginia. She is fourteen years old, and lives in the family of an Episcopal clergyman, who was a missionary in Western Africa some years ago. She is soon to return to her native land to marry the King, and, with her American education, she is expected to prove a useful Queen.

English tailors have recently made dresses for the Princess of Wales with the entire front and sides of the skirt covered with dark braid on white or light grounds, while for her daughters, the young princesses, are wide side panels, merely braided across the foot as a border, or else, the entire lower half may be covered with braiding in open, showy patterns.

Mrs. Custer, whose first book, "Boots and Saddles," has met with such universal favor both at home and abroad, is arranging materials for a work on frontier life in Kansas just after the civil war. She and her husband lived in that locality five years at that time, and between the Indians and the four-footed wild beasts the days and nights were alike filled with danger and perilous escapes.

Jenny June has long been known as one of the cleverest of women newspaper writers, and that she has not made money will be a surprise to many. To an interviewer she recently said: "If I had not owned my house in New York I fear I should have had many hard times. I have never received high prices for my work, nor do I receive them now. Allow me to tell you, my young friend, that high prices paid for journalistic worth are a myth. Such prices are never paid. If one is a magazine writer things are different, but I have always worked for newspapers and received newspaper prices. I have been enabled to get a living and to educate my children. That is about all. I am not a money-maker by any means. I never had any faculty that way."

A Sad Tale.

There lived in New York city during the last twenty-five years a family that consisted of a brother and two sisters. They were all members of the Presbyterian Church, and held that position in society that culture and a comfortable income secure.

It became apparent some years ago that the brother was tippling. His friends in the church expostulated with him, and as the effort availed nothing, afterwards sought counsel of his sister. The fact was admitted, yet excused and softened, and even to some degree exonerated. Ultimately the community were shocked to learn that the sisters had long drunk, and were then drinking heavily. The few counteracting cords that it is possible for friends or church to throw around the falling victims of our liquor traffic were quite too slight to prevail at all against habit and appetite which drink had strengthened, while it had demoralized conscience.

Rapidly the family passed the downward stages to poverty and contempt. It was during the last year that one of the sisters died. The sexton brought the case to the notice of one of the prominent ladies of the church, asking her to go and see what could be done. The details of the case were a single room; utter destitution; the living sister drunk upon the floor beside the dead; the landlord waiting only for the funeral to set what was left of the home, the income, and the respectability out upon the sidewalk. When a temporary lodging was sought for, it was found that in all that city there was not an institution that could, by its charter, receive the living woman, except the Tombs. And into its filth, with ignorance and crime, she was placed.

Out of this last startling fact grew an effort to establish a Home for inebriate women. But out of the sum of the facts, self-preservation, preaches to every one of us a powerful temperance sermon. The gist of it is—Let respectable people let drink alone.

The Standad.

MARKDALE, OCT. 21, 1886,

FALL SHOW PRIZE LISTS.

The Toronto dailies have shut down on publishing the prize lists for the Industrial, or other Exhibitions unles paid for at the regular advertising rates, while several country papers have come to the same conclusion.

There is perhaps no question without two sides, while this one is no exception to the rule. While the publishing of those lists are the source of untold annoyance to the publisher, (and of course the more of them the worse) yet as a rule, the prize list is sought after and read by the majority of subscribers in the vicinity of the exhibition, more than any other matter the publisher can furnish in its place. We are however inclined to coincide with the growing and expressed feeling of the press.

THE QUEBEC ELECTIONS.

The elections for the Quebec Legislature took place last Thursday but it seems difficulty to decide just how the result stands. The World is the most reliable paper at present to gain information on such a point, and it gives the result as follows—Conservatives 31, Liberals 29 and Independent 4. The latter will be equally divided, thus giving the liberals two of a majority.

THE WEEKLY PAPERS,

Its sphere is one of great power. It has an influence that the daily press does not possess. Weeklies are not thrown aside, but kept for perusal. People do not look at them chiefly for telegraphic intelligence, the record of the stock market, or immediate news of the moment. They expect careful and well-considered opinions, founded upon reflection. These papers are something more than the photograph of the passing period. They are prepared with a view to being read rather than being skimmed, and the time devoted to them is not snatched from business or from the daily occupation. The weekly paper is prized in the household, is read by all the family, and is more likely to be preserved than is any other issue of the press. This is what gives it influence far beyond its nominal circulation; and the more a paper preserves the distinctive features of weekly journalism, the greater its advantage in these respects.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING.

Newspaper advertising is now recognized, by business men having faith in their own wares, as the most effective means for securing for their goods wide recognition with their merits.

Newspaper advertising compels inquiry, and when the article offered is of good quality and at a fair price the natural result is increasing sales.

Newspaper advertising is a permanent addition to the reputation of the goods advertised, because it is a permanent influence always at work in their intrest.

Newspaper advertising is the most energetic and vigilant of salesmen, addressing thousands each day, always in the advertiser's intrest, and ceaselessly at work seeking customers from all classes.

Newspaper advertising promotes trade, for even in the dullest times advertisers secure by far the largest share of what is being done.

While the advertiser eats and sleeps printers, steam engines and printing presses are at work for him, trains are bearing his word to thousands of towns and hundred of thousands of readers, all of whom glancing with interest at the message prepared for them in the solitude of his office. No preacher ever spoke to so large an audience, or with so little effort, or so eloquently, as you, gentle reader, may do, with the newspaper man's assistance.

THE TWO SAM'S.

The Rev's Jones and Small continue to draw immense crowds to hear them in Toronto. We had the pleasure of listening to both this week and were, not a little, surprised at the congregations, from 2,000 to 5,000 at each service varying according to the hour, not apparently affected by the inclemency of the weather, as they are in Markdale. All the daily papers devote large space in reporting the sermons, some over a page daily, thus showing the general interest manifested. Jones is natural, or what many term "slaug'y." His illustrations given in common-place language, but wonderfully searching and well applied. Rev. Small is the opposite, his language dignified, well chosen and grandly eloquent.

Following are some of Sam. Jones'.

APHORISMS.

Hope is but a mile post on the way to Heaven.

I believe Christianity is nothing more or less than doing the best you can under the circumstances.

God does not judge by numbers; God goes by weight, many a good, fat 200 lbs. adverdupoised Methodist won't count ½ an ounce in God's scales.

What a blessed family that is where each is unselfish and kind to the other.

Where is the woman who can stand up and say, "I never said an unkind word to my sister?" She is here to night, but she hasn't got any sister.

Brother, let you and I spend the rest of our days controlling our tongues for good.

You drink beer for your health; your children because they like it.

If your son gets religion and goes to your cold, careless home, it will not be six months before he is as bad as you are, and you will say that Jones had better come back again and convert him over.

If you follow the footsteps of Christ you never will mislead one of your children.

If the pulpit thinks that it can dodge the question of capital and labor, it has got to be the best dodging machine in this world.

There are two many big piles of money, and too many poor men.

Ten hundred million dollars is too much for one man, and half a dollar is too little for another.

Be right and do right, and that is the only assurance in this world that God will protec us.

If you will show me a praying pew, I will show you a powerful pulpit.

It takes a first-class preacher and a first class hearer to get up a first-class sermon.

It's as much your duty to get ready to hear as it is my duty to get ready to preach.

Riches is as much in the way of religion as poverty.

Oh, brothers, let you and I realize that if we ever get to heaven there must be a process of making symmetrical and beautiful a character otherwise very unloving indeed.

You can't lay down your religion to-day and take it up again to-morrow and go on with it.

There's but one road to God's moral universe with heaven at one end and hell at the other. The question ain't which road are you on, but which way are you going?

Sin not only makes a man a rascal but makes him a fool.

From our own correspondent.

WEDDING BELLS.—Miss C. Leitch, daughter of our respected citizen, Thos. Leitch, Esq., to Mr. R. Myrick of Illinois, U. S. took place at the residence of the bride's father on Thursday last. The lovely bride was beautifully attired in white tartan. Miss Aggie Leitch, the bride's sister, and Miss Ayers were the bridesmaeds; they also wore dresses of tartan. Joseph Blackburn, Esq., was groomsman. The Rev. Robert Leitch the bride's brother, officiated, assisted by the Rev. W. Ayers. At the conclusion of the ceremony the bridal party, with the large number of guests present, retired to the dining hall where they partook of the viands and many other delicacies provided for the occasion. The handsome presents to the bride were numerous and costly. The newely married couple were accompanied by a good number of friends to the depot and left by the evening train for a tour through the western part of Canada thence to their new home near Chicago. The happy couple carry with them the kindest wishes of a large circle of friends in this locality.

The Rev. Mr. McCleland, of Shelburne, preached the Missionary sermon in connection with the Presbyterian church in this place on Sabbath last. He delivered a very practical and interesting discourse. The Rev. Mr. Cornish preached morning and evening in the Methodist church the anniversary sermons in connection with that church. His sermons were eloquent appropriate and interesting.

On Monday evening the Harvest Home Banquet was held in the same church, dinner was served from 4 p. m. till late in the evening, the tables fairly groaned under the loads of chickens, geese, turkeys, stuffed animals, and many other delicacies to numerous to mention. When all had gathered in the audience room of the church, after an opening hymn, Mr. Thorp Wright was called to the chair and to commence, delivered a very interesting chairman's speech reviewing the past thirty years of life in Artemesia; then followed addresses by a number of old pioneers. Mr. John Dinwoody, Mr. D. McMullen and Mr. Grange reach responded as their names were called and gave extempore very interestingly some reminisences of their lives in the backwoods of Artemesia. Then followed the clerical talent; Rev. A. Wilson was the first speaker. His address was brief and practical. He appeared in good spirits quite in keeping with the spirits of the occasion. Next followed Rev. G. Cornish, the speaper of the evening. His address was carefully prepared, well delivered and very interesting, but for such an occasion a little too lengthy. Next followed Rev. J. Watson who rose to complain of not having had due notice to be able to deliver a polished address. He appeared full of the spirit of criticism taking objection to some of the statements made by previous speakers, but amidst confusion of thought and jingle of words, we failed to catch the point aimed at by the speaker. The choir rendered some choice selections during the evening. A solo each by Miss Bellamy and Miss Leitch was well rendered and duly appreciated. The Brass Band was also present, and by several choice selections enlivened the proceedings. We would not omit noticing Rev. Mr. Ayers, although he carried both lumbago and cane, he appeared in his usual exultant manner. At the close a very hearty vote of thanks was moved by Rev. Wilson, seconded by J. W. Henderson, Esq., of Toronto, to the chairman and the ladies who had provided so many good things for the occasion which was unanimously carried and tendered to the same. The meeting closed by singing "God Save the Queen."

Mr. D. S. Munroe, late merchant in this place, has located in Indianna where he intends moving his family this week. We understand Miss Wright, Mrs. Munroe's sister, proposes accompanying her on her long journey. We would suppose there must be good openings for business men down South, as this is the second migration from this locality in the last three months.

Mr. W. Cook had one of his feet badly crushed in the horse-power of a threshing machine at John Harrison's a few days ago, but is now doing as well as could be expected.

WANTED TO SWEAR.

The kindest, sweetest, most unselfish, and most truly religious woman I ever met, once confessed to me that she was the reverse of everything I thought her, for at that very moment she wanted to swear.

If a white rose could have found speech and communicated its desire to commit murder, it could hardly have been more startling, and yet I was not as much surprised as others might have been, having seen and heard a great many peculiar things connected with the inception and progress of nervous diseases.

"I only tell you this," the poor little woman added with a painful flush, because every friend and acquaintance I have constantly overrate me. I want some one to know me as I am, and I am a very wicked woman."

"You haven't come to be outwardly profane yet, I suppose?" I inquired in a tone of facetiousness that evidently wounded her sensitive spirit, for she said quickly:

"Oh, please don't make light of it. It is desperate business with me, I assure you."

"I have no intention of making light of it," I replied. "On the contrary, I consider it a very serious matter, and if you go on as you are going now, you will not only want to swear, but you will swear."

"If I go on as I am going now?" my friend repeated, a look of wonderment on her sweet face, "I don't know what you mean; but I am sure of this, that if I ever give utterance to the awful things that come into my head, I shall not be in possession of my senses."

"To clothe those thoughts with words would prove you insane. If that is the case, what kind of a mental condition can you be in to think such thoughts?"

"That I can think such dreadful things proves that there is a moral screw loose, it seems to me," was the reply, made with the manner of one who had evidently thought the subject out to her satisfaction.

The condition of this woman was so analagous to that of another friend which had come immediately under my observation, that I thought best to tell her the story. This friend had been a model house-keeper for twenty years. No better wife, a more conscientous mother, could have been found in the whole Province. She was neatness and thrift personified. Her house, large, roomy and comfortable was presided over exclusively by herself. She had done all the cooking for her family, attended to the milk of a dozen cows, made the butter, and washed all the dishes, and it was on this latter rock that her domestic craft was dashed and almost wrecked. There came to this woman at last a time when she was compelled to force herself to the performance of these various duties Then she scourged herself and called it laziness anp went on. After a while she was attacked by a low fever which the country doctor did not understand, and out of which she wrestled long before she was really able to sit up. Her husband was amply able to pay for competent domestic assistance, but as she had always chosen to do everything herself, it never entered his head to propose it, and this became a deep rooted grievance. She could not overcome the abnormal sensitiveness which was the direct result of long years of over-work and suffering, and so a coldness sprang up between husband and wife, which on her part developed into positive hatred. On the subject of washing dishes this woman became a confirmed monamaniac. She could drag herself about and make the bed, and cook the dinner; but the dishes drove her wild.

One day her husband ran to a neighbor with the astonishing news that she had at last gone stark, staring mad. The lady followed him home and found this once model house-keeper standing by the kitchen sink, laughing hysterically, and surrounded by mashed crockery of every description. As they entered, a sugar-bowl went slam-bang against the cupboard door, followed by a couple of handsome goblets, evidently the last of a new dozen.

"There," she said to her husband, "now, go and buy some new dishes, and then hire somebody to wash 'em. As long as I live I will never wash another one."

Now, horrible as this scene certainly was, and suggestive of straight-jackets and padded rooms, the fact really was after all that this patient had at last attained to sanity. This statement should have been made years before. It could then have been done in a calmer spirit, and with much less expense.

Now, it so happened, that the neighbor who had been summoned to this crockery raid was a woman of intelligence and experience, and through her influence the sufferer was taken from her home and placed under the care of a physician who was competent to deal with every form of nervous misery. With rest and judicious treatment, she entirely recovered. For the first two weeks she was sure that she could never see a dish without a desire to smash it. At the end of a month she could not understand how she could ever have been guilty of such conduct. Then came a period of remorse for her treatment of her husband, and other symptoms incidental to the restoration of a normal condition. It took six months to pad these bare and irritated nerves, and six more to attain to the physical strength which would make it safe for her to attempt the care of her much simplified housekeeping. But she returned to her home a wiser woman, and has since been a great comfort and help to other exhausted and overworked women.

"And you think my state as dangerous as that!" my companion inquired after listening with great interest to the story.

"Fully," I answered.

"But what am I to do?"

"Stop before it is too late."

"Stop what?"

"You have invitations out for a dinner party next week. Does the anticipation of it give you pleasure or the reverse?"

"If I were to talk a week, I could never make you understand how I loathe the thought of it."

"You are one of the chief managers of the orphan asylum fair. Do you feel enthusiastic about that job?"

"Oh, you are almost cruel," my companion responded with a quiver of her sensitive lip. "What if I were to tell you that I hate the sight and sound of that orphan asylum, and that sometimes I feel as if I would hardly care what became of the orphans if I were not obliged to see them again?"

"And yet you are perfectly aware that such a condition is in total opposition to your real, true nature?"

"Oh, I hope it is."

"How about your own children?"

"Their innocent fun drives me distracted, and I am only happy when they are asleep or out of the house. This has nothing to do with my health. I eat and sleep fairly. In fact, the only place where I am truly comfortable is in the bed with my door locked. I never pass the bed, or a rocker or lounge that I do not want to throw myself down and close my eyes. To have some one rap at my door after I have grown a little quiet puts such thoughts and words into my head that then I am afraid to be alone. I tell you it is a question of morals and not of health. It is total depravity."

These symptoms are all danger signals. Months and months ago this woman went to the end of her tether. All that has been done since has been accomplished by the cruel use of irritated and exhausted nerves. She has now only half a hand, so to speak, on the helm. Her will is no longer strong enough to eliminate her thoughts, and every day under the present regime will find her less and less able to put a curb upon the feelings and passions which she so deprecates. More than one good woman has wanted to swear, and concealed the fact for years, but ultimately used every bad word she ever thought of within the walls of a lunatic asylum. It was possible for this patient to have the best medical advice and follow it. She needed neither a confessor nor a minister, but a wise physician, a complete change, and rest for body and soul. When will women, intelligent and sensible in all other matters, come to understand the difference between illness and laziness, fever exhaustion and moral depravity?

ON A VISIT TO THE "OLD COUNTRY."

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Across the wide Atlantic sea
  Our steamer speeds her way,
Great billows rolling grand and free
  Rest not by night or day.

At last the land recedes from sight,—
  The great new land of hope,
Where enterprise and honest might Find fair and ample scope.

A week has pass'd, yet sea and sky
  Seem all of earth to me,
Until at last the welcome cry
  Is heard with joy and glee:—

"Land, ho!—land, ho!"—a sailor cries,
  But naught to us is seen;
An hour or two, and then our eyes
  Behold the welcome scene:—

Great headlands rise, like sentries bold,
  Or guardians of the land;
Their tops, like helmets, shine with gold
  In sunset hues so grand!

Still on we speed, with hope and joy
  Our hearts feel like to sing!
Our thoughts on "home" find sweet employ
  As early scenes up-spring!

The fair green hills of Ireland rise,
  Resplendent to the view,
And seem an earthly Paradise
  To loving hearts and true!

'Tis hard to leave the deck to-night,
  I scarce can go to sleep;
I toss and dream till morning light
  Comes shining o'er the deep!

Now, dear old Scotia's mountains rise
  As up the Clyde we steam,
Like friends of old they cheer our eyes,
  Or like a pleasant dream!

At last we reach the same old pier
  Where years ago we parted,
Here once we wept, now joy's glad tear
  From loving eyes has started!

Oh, friends of early days, and "home"
  Of childhood's happy years;
My thoughts are yours where'er I roam,
  For you my prayers and tears!

She Knew it Hurt Papa.

Little Ruth—"Mamma, I don't like that woman doctor a bit."

Omaha Mamma—"Why, dear, Dr. Blank has such a sweet face and such winning manners that you should love her. Why do you not?

"She hurt papa this morning."

"Hurt papa!"

"Yes. You know how sick papa was when she called. Well, when you went out of the room she went over to pap's bedside and took him by the chin and shook just as hard and told him there wasn't a thing the matter with him."

"She did!"

"Yes; and I know it hurt papa, for he said, 'you'd knock the affliction out of any man.'"

A Difference.

Policeman—"Git now."

Tough—"Is it git, ye soy?"

Policeman—"Yes, skip, or I'll run ye in."

Tough—"If I called ye a bloomin' scoundral an' said ye were a disgrace to yer uniform, what would I git?"

Policeman—"Not less than a month."

Tough—"If I didn't say it but only thought it?"

Policeman—"You bouldn't be sent up for that."

Tough—"Then just consider that I only think it."

"There is one thing," said Yellowly, "that shows the glory of this country. Every man has it in his power to make his daughter a lady." "How is that?" asked Brownley. "He can make her a maid-lady."

YOUNG FOLKS.

A TALK ABOUT BRIDGES.

BY ROSSITER JOHNSON.

When was the first bridge constructed? and what was it made of? I am not able to answer the first question very definitely, but I think I know what the first bridge was made of. It was not of wood, nor of stone, nor of brick, nor of iron, nor of rope. It was made entirely of monkeys—live monkeys. A troop of these animals in a South American forest came one day to a stream which was too wide for them to leap across. They climbed a high tree, where the first monkey selected a suitable branch, wound his long, powerful tail about it, and let himself hang headlong downward. The second monkey running down the body of the first, wound his tail about its neck and shoulders, and let himself hang headlong downward. A third and a fourth added themselves in succession, and others after them, till the chain reached the ground. Then the lowest monkey, by striking his hands on the earth, set the living pendulum in motion, and increased this motion by striking again at each oscillation, till it swung so far across the stream that he was able to seize a branch of a tree on the other side. The line of monkeys now constituted a bridge, by which the remainder of the troop quickly passed over. Then the monkey which (not who as the people write it) had been the first volunteer in this engineer corps, unwound his tail from the branch and let go. What had before been the top of the pendulum was now the bottom; it swung across the stream, and dissolved into its original elements, and the whole troop went chattering on their way. This took place before the appearance of man on the earth, and the long-tailed monkeys have been building such bridges ever since.

Between that primitive bridge of monkeys and the last and greatest of all bridges ever undertaken—the suspension bridge over East River connecting New York and Brooklyn—there is apparently a wide discrepancy; yet the two are constructed on the same principal.

The first bridge recorded in history was built over the Euphrates at Babylon, in the reign of Queen Nitocris. The course of the river was turned, and its bed lay dry, till the foundations were built. The arches were of immense hewn stones, clamped together with iron, and the whole bridge was roofed over. It was thirty feet wide, and over six hundred feet long. No remnant of this great bridge has been discovered in modern times.

By a bridge of boats nearly a mile long Xerxes crossed the Hellespont near Abydos, with his immense army, on his expedition against Greece. A century and a half later (334 B. C.), Alexander crossed in the opposite direction, at nearly the same point, and by the same means, to invade Asia. Bridges of boats, called pontoon bridges, are in common use for movements of armies. A row of boats is anchored in the stream, placed at regular distances apart and stretching from bank to bank. The prows all point up stream. Beams are laid across from boat to boat, and on these beams a flooring is laid.

Besides those used by armies, there are a few permanent bridges of boats. The most celebrated now in existence is that across the Rhine at Cologne.

There was once a floating bridge across the River Seine, at Rouen, which was about eight hundred feet long, and was paved with stones, like a street. It was moored with immense chains, and rose and fell with the tide. But it cost a great deal of money to keep it in repair, and some time in the last century it was abandoned.

The greatest and most famous of all floating bridges was that built by the Roman Emperor Caligula, in A. D. 39. An immense number of boats were anchored in the bays of Baiæ and Puteoli, in two lines, in the form of a crescent, over three miles long, a flooring of planks was laid upon them, and fresh water was conveyed to them by pipes from the shore. When all was ready, the Emperor, accompanied by his court and a throng of spectators, rode in solemn procession from one end of the bridge to the other. He was clothed in costly robes adorned with gold and pearls, and wore Alexander's breastplate and a civil crown. At evening the whole bridge was illuminated with torches and lanterns, the Caligula boasted that he had turned the night into day, as well as the sea into land." The whole court slept that night in the houses on the bridge. Next day there was another procession, in which Caligula rode in a triumphal chariot, followed by a train of other chariots. The insane emperor then made an oration in praise of his work, and wound up the festivities by ordering a large number of the spectators to be thrown into the sea.

Wooden bridges are of course not so durable as those of stone or iron, and are generally less important. Julius Cæsar built a famous one across the Rhine when he invaded Germany.

One of the most famous bridges in our country was that across the gorge of Genesee River at Portage, N. Y., erected in 1851-52. It was the largest wooden bridge in the world, and to build it required all the available timber that grew on the two hundred and five acres of heavily timbered land. Its length was eight hundred feet, its height above the water two hundred and thirty-four feet. It was a vast network of square beams crossed in X shape, and was so constructed that any one beam, when it became unsound, could be taken out and another inserted in its place. A few men were kept busy all the time replacing unsound timbers, for of course every beam would begin to rot sooner or later. This bridge which carried a branch of the Erie Railway over the gulf, was destroyed by fire on May 6, 1875, and on the last day of the next July (eighty-six days) a train passed over the new iron bridge erected in its place. This new bridge is one of the most airy structures in existence. It is almost entirely of wrought iron, and weighs eight hundred tons. It has the same height and length that the wooden bridge had, and stands partly on the same piers.

Four or five miles from its mouth in Lake Ontario, the Genesee pakes through another gorge, two hundred feet deep, with nearly perpendicular rocky walls. Several attempts have been made to bridge it at this point, but all have failed. One of the first was a curiously constructed wooden bridge, a single Gothic arch of timber-wood spanning the entire chasm. It was a pretty piece of architecture to look at, but it lacked the very strength to sustain its own weight. The enormous mass of timber began to press in the sides of the arch and throw up the top of it where the timber was comparatively light. When this became apparent, the builders drew great rocks upon the bridge, and placed them over the point of the arch, to prevent it from being forced up. But it was all in vain. The bridge had been warranted for a year; and when it had stood just one year and one day, the arch finally gave way, and the whole thing rushed down to ruin. A gentlemen who was driving across it when it began to fall, whipped up his horse and barely escaped. This took place about fifty years ago.

In 1757 a wonderful wooden bridge was built over the Rhine at Schaffausen, by a Swiss carpenter named Grubenmann. It had two arches, one span being one hundred and ninety-three feet, and the other one hundred and seventy-two feet. Where they met their ends rested on a stone pier. This bridge did not possess the advantage of the one at Portage, described above; and when some of the bottom timbers rotted, it was necessary to lift the whole structure with jack-screws, before new ones could be put in. The bridge was burned by the French army, in 1799.

There are many fine wooden bridges in the United States, but none perhaps which are so famous or so curious as to claim particular description here. One of the finest is the railway bridge over Susquehanna River at Havre de Grace. It is three thousand two hundred and seventy-one feet long, and has twelve spans. The longest bridge in the world is near Eezek, in Hungary. It crosses the River Drave and the marshes that lie on each side of it, a few miles from its mouth in the Danube. It is of wood, with stone piers, and was built in 1566, to be used by the Turkish armies entering Hungary. There is nothing remarkable about it except its length, eight miles.

Whistling and Whistlers.

If a boy is allowed to whistle it will turn his attention in a great degree from the desire to become the possessor of a drum, and if paternal firmness be added, he can be kept satisfied without one until he gets to be 16 years old, when he will strike the cornet period.

Shakspeare was well acquainted with the art. He makes Othello say concerning Desdemona: "If I do but prove her false, I'll whistle her off and let her down the wind a prey to fortune, e'en though her very cries were my dead heart-strings."

Negroes are the best whistlers in the world. Frequently one hears a colored improvisatore whistling the quaintest and sweetest melodies, and with the colored males in general whistling comes as natural as grunting does to a hog.

Men whistle when they are happy, and they whistle when they are sad. When you see a carpenter or a house-painter pushing the plane or slapping on the paint and whistling a lively air at the same time, set him down as a man who pays his debts, is cheerful at home and never whips his children.

When a man is sad he whistles in a doleful tone. Nine times out of ten he won't choose a dismal air, but he will whistle a lively tune, a hornpipe or a negro minstrel end song. And he will draw the melody in and out between his lips in a way to draw tears from all listeners. Sometimes a man accomplishes the same result when he is cheerful and trying to whistle real good.

Girls in general whistle in a sort of jerky, disconnected, jim-jam sort of way, and groan mildly between the tones. They'd better let whistling alone.

The Shortening Days.

The amateur astronomer will find a source of unfailing interest in observing the apparent movements of the sun. During October the days continue to lessen rapidly. On the 1st the sun rose at 5:41 a. m. and set at 5:26 p. m., making the length of the day 11 hours 45 minutes. On the 31st the sun rises at 6:17 a. m. and sets at 4:38 p. m., making the length of the day 10 hours 31 minutes. The amount of the day's decrease in October is therefore 1 hour 24 minutes. Thus on the last day of the month the days are nearly an hour and a half shorter than they were at its commencement. It is not strange that the remark is often mades "How short the days are!" The sun's position in the heavens gives another indication of the season's advance. Observers will readily note that the sunrise and sunset points seem to move rapidly southward. On the 1st the sun's declination was 3° 21′ south; on the 31st is is 14° 16′ south. The sun therefore advances 10° 55′ on his southern course during the month. The further the sun moves to the south the shorter is the circuit he makes in the heavens and the less is his meridian altitude. The days will decrease, the sunrise and sunset points move south, and the sun will each day be lower in the heavens until the Winter solstice, when the sun reaches his extreme southern declination and turns his face slowly northward. Those who watch closely the movements of the great luminary, so complex in appearance, so simple in reality, will more fully comprehend his sovereign sway over the brotherhood of planets, who shine in his borrowed light, yield unswervingly to his all-powerful influence, and reflect every pulsation of his huge mass.

A Dangerous Boarder.

The widow Flapjack got a new boarder the other day. At the first meal he took he choked and had a terrible time trying to swallow some coffee.

"What's the matter, stranger?" she asked kindly.

"Nothing except that coffee went down the wrong way."

"Good heavens; it isn't possible that I have secured a boarder with two throats," exclaimed Mrs. Flapjack, who has been complaining very bitterly of the amount of food a man with only one throat can destroy.

City cousin (at ball, to country cousin): "Considerable difference betwixt this and a hop in the country, is there not?" Country cousin: "Well—er—yes. Ye see, they wear clo'se all over 'em out in our parts."

HOUSEHOLD.

Laundering Fine Linen.

The proper laundering of fine table linen was formerly considered one of the accomplishments of a gentlewoman, but in these days of modern young ladies can make even pies without the slightest tense of understanding it. The art, while it saves labor, does it at the expense of much of the beauty of the table-cloth or napkin that passes through it. The starching out of the very thin starch, or water should be done by hand, and is not at all necessary that starched linen should be wrung very dry. Shaking especially should be wrung very dry. Shaking hands will do just as well. Shake articles thoroughly or fold them into convenient able size and snap them as housewives know so well how to do. But little starch should be used in such articles, just enough to give them a new feeling and to take off the polish of the iron. It is not necessary to use any starch at all if the linen is ironed when quite damp and patiently goes through until thoroughly dry.

Always take table-cloths from the line while still damp, repeating the shaking and snapping process as long as the cloth's strength will permit. If allowed to become entirely dry on the line there will be wrinkles in table linen that it will be difficult if not impossible to iron out. Care must be taken as to how they are hung up in the first place. Do not let them be dragged out of shape by hanging from a single clothes pin, or by being thrown over the clothes post, making a projecting corner that it will be next to impossible to get out without wetting the cloth all over. When they have been thoroughly shaken join them evenly in a straight, firm line. Take care that the pins are clean and the line as well. They should never be allowed to whip or flap in the very high wind. Fine linen is often injured in this way. A quiet day and a bright sun is the best time for doing up fine pieces of this sort. Never dry them indoors or before the fire if it can be avoided. They cannot smell as clean and have "the exquisite purity of clean clothes" that a famous king of old preferred to all other perfumes.

Fold the linen evenly and roll up in a tight roll, wrapping large pieces in towels so that they will not dry on the side. Napkins should be similarly treated and each size and pattern rolled up in towels in packages by themselves ready to iron. The irons should be hot and as hot as possible without danger of scorching. Iron table linen in single folds as you wish to bring the pattern out handsomely, and let there be several thicknesses of flannel upon the ironing-board. A heavy towel may be laid over the portion of the cloth that the operator will not immediately reach. When the entire surface has been ironed fold lengthwise and iron again over the selvedge toward the operator. Go over the entire length of that side, then fold over the just-completed portion inside, and continue until the cloth is folded and ironed. If still damp hang in the sun or on a clothes horse until thoroughly dry. Napkins may be similarly done and should never be ironed their first ironing when folded together. They may be gone over singly, then folded as directed in the table-cloth. It is not the province of the laundress to make fancy folds in the napkin. That is done, if at all, when they are on the table.

It must not be forgotten that starched linen mildews in a few hours in warm weather. Even if there is no discoloration the starch will turn sour. For this there is no remedy but another washing, as the odor of the sour starch is very disagreeable.

Choice Recipes.

Madelins.—Cream one cup of butter with one cup and three-quarters of sugar, add three eggs, two cups of flour, one-half cup of corn starch, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and one teaspoonful of extract of vanilla. Bake in patty pans in a quick oven.

Lemon Rice.—Pick and wash one cup of rice, put it into a deep earthen dish with one quart of water and a little salt; cover tightly and place on the back of the range or stove, where it may gradually cook without danger of burning. If the water should be consumed before the rice is done add enough to swell it out tender; care must be taken that the grains remain whole. When the rice has become tender put it in a colander and pour cold water over it to separate the grains; drain it well and replace in the dish. Then add white sugar to taste—it needs to be very sweet—the grated rind of one and the juice of two lemons; set back on the stove and let simmer ten or twelve minutes; then pour into a wet mold, and when cooled put on ice until wanted. Turn out like a blanmange.

Irish Stew.—Three pounds of lean mutton cut into pieces not more than two inches square. Stew the meat gently in enough cold water to cover it until it is tender; remove from the fire, strain off the gravy, and set it in a cool place to allow the fat to rise to the top. Skim off every particle of fat and return the gravy to the stove; season to taste with a little chopped onion and herbs, and put the meat into it together with a dozen potatoes which have been pared, boiled and sliced; cook fifteen minutes and serve very hot. By allowing the gravy to cool and removing the tallowy cake that rises to the top the disagreeable oleaginous taste will be avoided and a very different dish will be evolved from that which usually figures under the name of Irish stew.

Bottled Pickles.—Let a hundred fresh cucumbers stand in salt and water three days. Boil ten minutes in half a gallon of good vinegar, one ounce of mustard seed, one of juniper berries, one of celery seed, a dozen green peppers, two pounds of sugar, a few small onions, and a lump of alum. Pour the vinegar while hot over the pickles for three mornings, heating each time; mix a quarter of a pound of mustard with the vinegar. Put the pickles in bottles and seal.

Onion Pickles.—Take large white onions, remove the skin, and pour over boiling salt water, let stand three days, pour off and put in fresh brine, let stand over night. Then put in one gallon of vinegar, adding two ounces of tumeric, scald and pour over the onions to cover the jar and let the onions stand for ten days, then pour off and put on the vinegar, seasoned with red pepper, horseradish, celery-seed, mustard, and mixed spices.

ENTERPRISING INDIANS.

Going into a General Transportation Business on Their Own Hook.

The Northern Sionx Indians have under headway an enterprise which is at once novel and important. It has been determined by the councilmen of the Sioux Nation, as well as by general assent among the people, to establish mail and transportation routes throughout the frontier region which shall be conducted exclusively by Indians and as an Indian enterprise. The principal part of the work will be done by the young men of the nation, while the older ones will supervise, counsel, plan, and manage. All the labor connected with the transportation of mail, passengers, and freight, will be performed on foot, and the athletic young Indians are now in training for their part of the enterprise. The mail carriers will travel by twos and the freight and passenger carriers by fours. It is intended to have the routes embrace every place that is considered a frontier town. Several hundred Indians will be employed and all must be men of sobriety and honesty.

The loads for mail teams will be limited to 200 pounds, and those for frieght and passenger teams to 1,000 pounds. The mail carriers will travel at the rate of eight miles per hour, net, the passenger carriers at the rate of five miles. The men will be harnessed to strong but light vehicles, made especialy for the work. Boarding stations will be established every 25 miles, and this distance is to constitute travel for each team. Every runner will be required to make three trips per week. A term of 90 days is to be the limit of a year's work for one individual. At the expiration of each term the Indians who have been in service are to return to their reservations and their places will be filled by a fresh lot. The whole business is to be conducted on the co-operative principle, Every member of the Sioux Nation will receive a percentage of the earnings after the men who perform the work have been paid their salaries and all other necessary expenses have been settled.

Night Life and Character,

One night often destroys a whole life: The leakage of the night keeps the day forever empty. Night is sin's harvest time. More sin and crime are committed in one night than in all the days of the week. This is more emphatically true in the city than the country. The street lamps, like a file of soldiers with torch in hand, stretch away in long lines on either sidewalk; the gay colored transparencies are ablaze with attractions; the saloon and billiard halls are brilliantly illuminated; music sends forth its enchantment; the gay company begins to gather to the haunts and houses of pleasure; the gambling dens are aflame with palatial splendor; the theaters are wide open; the mills of destruction are grinding health, honor, happiness and hope out of a thousand lives. The city under the gaslight is not the same as under God's sunlight. Night life in our cities is a dark problem whose depths and abysses and whirlpools make us start back with horror. All night long tears are falling, blood is streaming. Young men, tell me how and where you spend your evenings, and I will write you a chart of your character and final destiny, with blanks to insert your names. It seems to me an appropriate text would be: "Watchman, what of the night?" Policeman, pacing thy beat, what of the night? What are the young men of the city doing at night? Who are their associates? What are their habits? Where do they go in and when do they come out? Policeman, would the night life of young men commend them to the confidence of their employers? Would it be to their credit? Make a record of the nights of one week. Put in the morning papers the names of all young men, their habits and haunts, that are on the streets for sinful pleasure. Would there not be shame and confusion? Some would not dare to go to their places of business; some would not dare to come home at night; some would leave the city; some would commit suicide. Remember, young men, that in the retina of the All-Seeing Eye there is nothing hid but shall be revealed on the last day.

The Flying Dutchman.

It is a fact not generally known that the Flying Dutchman was a real ship and its captain a real character. In the early seventeenth century, when competition between the Dutch and English for East Indian trade ran high, one ship, plying between Rotterdam and Java, was known as the Flying Dutchman. Its captain and owner was one Bernard Fokke, whose name deserves to be exhumed as that of the first man who used iron in the construction of a ship. Sheets of iron were visible in many parts of Fokke's ship, and the populace, knowing well that iron naturally sinks, grew suspicious when this one, instead of sinking, surpassed all others in swiftness.

It seemed "uncanny," as the Scotch say. Wiseacres of the wharf shook their heads as the big taciturn captain passed to his ship which so defied the laws of specific gravity. With what dark power of the air or the wave was he in league? When from one of its voyages the Flying Dutchman never returned these suspicions organized into the seed from which grew the well-known superstition. It was whispered that, in trying to round the Cape of Good Hope, the iron-bound ship was repeatedly driven back by storms, till at last the Captain cried, "I will round that cape if it takes me till Judgment Day!" Then a voice of thunder echoed down the sky—"till Judgment Day!" So the Flying Dutchman was believed to be doomed to try and round the cape till Judgment Day.

What it Costs to Keep a Man for Seventy-five Years.

I met one of our old citizens on the street the other day, who is in the 76th year of his age. He said: "Do you know that it costs between $6,000 and $7,000 to raise a man of my age?" I answered no. He continued: "Well, sir, in the past seventy-five years I have partaken of 82,125 meals, consumed 62,595 pounds of solid food, drank 51,100 cups of tea and 18,250 cups of coffee. I have not lived extravagantly and my meals have cost me on an average eight cents each. Therefore, the 82,125 meals have cost me $6,570." Where is there an octogenarian who can figure closer than this?

He had been cutting bands and in the temporary absence of the feeder he stepped upon the feeder's platform and began feeding the machine. By some means he lost his balance and fell into the cylinder, stopping the machine instantly. He was taken out horribly mangled and died in a few moments.

Mr. Matthew Sedgewick, of Dummer, had a year-old calf which he believed died of hydrophobia. On driving it to the creek, which runs through his farm, the animal, seeing the water, appeared to become mad, frothed at the mouth, and run and tumbled violently around the field, showing all the symptoms of hydrophobia. Mr. Sedewick secured his rifle, and after firing four shots, succeeded in killing the frantic animal. He believes it was bitten by a mad dog that was seen in the neighborhood a few days previously.

A rich mica mine has been discovered in the township of Methven, County of Peterboro, and has been acquired by Mr. William Martin, of Kingston, and Mr. Seth Welch, of Wollaston. About two tons have been blasted, and one piece of pure mica weighing thirty pounds, has been obtained. This has been sent to New York for examination. It is pure and white, and the promise is very good. Six feet of depth has been explored, and the mica is found to be better as the workmen go down. The mine is believed to be ten acres in extent.

Catharine Jeffreys, of St. John, N. B., thirteen years of age, while stopping at Moncton met a little girl named Ryan, ten years old, and persuaded her to go to St. John. On arriving there the Moncton girl was taken to a house and was persuaded by the Jeffreys girl to remove her clothing. The Jeffreys girl then donned the clothing and left the house. This left the Ryan girl in such a state that she did not care to go out on the street, but she succeeded finally in attracting attention, and was at length taken to the police station, where she explained the particulars of her loss.

The Mono Mills shooting case was heard at Brampton last week, by Judge Scott. It is learned from the evidence that the prisoner, Thomas Kidd, is a man of considerable means, owning some 300 acres of land, besides notes and cash. He is eccentric, and it is alleged that at times he keeps his money hid under stones and stumps in the fields. Not long ago his father when very seriously ill, made a will, leaving to Thomas another farm in Albion. But the old man recovered unexpectedly, and Thomas then wanted to occupy the farm free of rent. To this the father objected, and rented the place to his son Henry. Thomas refused to leave the place and a series of quarrels resulted. The judge found the prisoner guilty of common assault, but on his engaging to leave the farm in dispute and binding himself to keep the peace for a year a fine of only $5 was imposed.

The verdict of the coroner's jury in the Plum Hollow tragedy in Leeds is that A. L. Carr was wilfully murdered by R. H. Carle, Daniel Carle, and H. C. Carle. The scene of the murder presented a terrible spectacle the morning after the deed was committed. The body of the murdered man lay on the road untouched from nine o'clock Wednesday night until ten o'clock on Thursday morning. The house was wrecked and the door-yard filled with bedding, broken chairs, and crockery. The supposition is that Richard Carle, being at one time a volunteer and having a duplicate key of the armory, which key has since been found, took the volunteer equipments, and after fitting his brothers out in uniforms which were turned inside out, started to raid Mrs. Day's house. Many of the neighbors also blame Stevens, who owns the house. He is an uncle of the Carle boys, and is reported to have offered $10 cash and a gallon of whiskey to have Mrs. Day put out. The three Carles have been arrested and lodged in gaol at Brockville.

Cosmopolitan England.

England owns more ocean-going tonnage than all the rest of the world, and her trade with foreign lands is more extensive than that of any other country. Her merchants and her ships are in all ports. The traders of London seem to have the most intimate connections with merchants in every quarter of the globe.

A glance at the general advertising columns of the London Times will give one a clear idea of the ramifications of her commerce. Here one will see in a single page announcements of the sailings of ships of every class and bound about everywhere, and offerings of merchandise in any quantity and of all types, and the products of all lands. But a look at a few of the special advertisements will give one a clearer idea of England's outlying business connections.

Here among the wants are calls for men to fill situations in all latitudes, and also notices of persons in need of places whose addresses range from the pole to the equator.

In the "for sale" columns are offerings of coffee plantations in Ceylon, sugar estates in India and Cuba, chateaus in France and Spain, ranches and mines in the United States, barional halls and deer forests in Scotland, iron mines in Russia and indigo fields in the far East.

Just below an advertisement in this London paper of situations wanted of London footmen and coachmen I find this notice which is from far Bengal:

REQUIRED IMMEDIATELY—A FIRST class stud groom, to take charge of the Stables of a native chief in Bengal. Good character indispensable. Must be a good horseman and understand veterinary work. Age between 30 and 40. Unmarried preferred. For particulars apply H. Sr. JOHN KNELLER, Esq., Oriental Club, Hanover Square, W.

As incidental to the subject it is interesting to note that England's mail service, domestic or foreign, which is of the best character, gives every facility for postal communication between her home and distant people. And this postal interchange is rapidly on the increase. The annual growth of England's population is about one per cent. The increase in her correspondence has been going on in the last thirty years at about the rate of six per cent. Thirty years ago the average of letters to each person was fifteen, to-day it is forty-two—a larger average than that of any other country.

De Lesseps and His Canal.

M. De Lesseps is the Napoleon of this colossal enterprise, and, it is to be feared, he carries out the parallel in a certain indifference to the sacrifice of human life. He looks beyond to the object, and he sees the route to San Francisco shortened by five thousand miles, the route to Canton and Shanghai by ten thousand, and the route to Calcutta by thirteen thousand, as against the old passage by the Horn. A whole army of labor perished to make the Panama railway and another army, it seems, must follow it to the shades to cut this trench. Most of his stamp do not count the cost, either for themselves or others, and his example seems to have proved infectious with his subordinates. The chief engineer of the company, who imprudently took out his family with him, has seen every member of it die around him, and now remains a lonely old man to finish his task. The scheme has survived every disconragement, even that of the report of the distinguished engineer lately sent out by the French government to enlighten public opinion. M. Roussean's misgivings, it was thought, would check that tranquil flow of millions on which the scheme has hitherto pursued its easy course. It did not. M. De. Lesseps called for another loan to fill his almost exhausted coffers, and the money came in from every city and hamlet in France. The French know no measure of confidence; they give all or none. It has pleased, them in the inscrutable workings of their minds, to believe that nothing is impossible to the projector of the Suez canal. If they were obliged to recognise an exception, they would still be prepared to say with Tertullian that the very impossibility is but certainty's crowning proof. The canal will probably be finished, because, in the first place, the French people believe in M. De Lesseps, and, in the second, because M. De Lesseps can not suffer himself to die with this giant labor unachieved. It is the only ocean canal of the first magnitude still left to the enterprise of mankind; and M. De Lesseps and his countrymen can not leave it to another individual and another race. Suez and Panama exhaust the great possibilities of the planet in this particular line. M. De Lesseps has accomplished Suez, and, as a consumate artist in ambition, he owes Panama to the rounded completeness of his fame.

They all Have Gone Away.

BY H. S. KELLER.

There was Kit, as fair a lassie
As ever you did see,
A merry, winsome maiden
With a heart as pure and free
From guile as Summer flowers
On a rosy Summer day—
She's left us in our sorrow
And she's gone away to stay.

There was Jammie, noble hero,
A lad—our heart's delight—
He marched away in uniform
To enter in the fight.
We watch the rising sunbeam
And the closing of the day,
But no more we'll see our Jammie,
For he's gone away to stay.

There was Ned, our boyish darling,
Our roguish little elf,
He always thought of others
But never of himself.
The sea it took our laddie
And buried him away.
We never more will see him,
For he's gone away to stay.

And so we're sitting lonely,
My poor old wife and I;
We're building phantom fancies
From shadows passing by.
We're waiting, only waiting
The dawning of the day
When we shall meet again and keep
The loved ones gone away.

"Cat-tails boiled for ten minutes won't drop off," says a florist, but won't the cats object to waiting while they are being boiled?

"And shall you try to break his will?" the caller wanted to know, after the widow had told her how the recently deceased had fixed the property and rather left her out. "Try?" the widow echoed as she smoothed out her dress complacently. "I don't think there will be much try about it. I didn't have any trouble breaking his will when he was alive and I don't think it is going to trouble me any this time."

FOREIGN NEWS.

Miss Welch,, of Buffalo, has been dining at an hotel in Edinburgh, and describes a festivity known as "an ice-cream effect" in this way; "Instead of being brought upon the table in a brick or pyramid, the ice-cream was cut in good-sized slices, which was laid around a circular cake of ice a foot or ten inches high. This was hollowed out in the middle, and illuminated by a lighted candle inside. The effect was very brilliant."

The Princess Wilhelmine, heir to the throne of Holland, has lately celebrated her sixth birthday anniversary. On that occasion the Queen invited to the royal palace all children born on the same day as the Princess and treated them to a banquet and presents of toys. A surprising number responded to the call, and though the Queen welcomed them all, she was heard to remark that the 31st of Aug., 1880, must have been the greatest day for births on record.

Some crafty Hindoos have invented a cunning dodge for making money. They catch a goodly number of snakes, and then tell their pious fellow-natives that they are about to take the reptiles and give them up to the Government to be killed, thereby gaining a reward offered for poisonous snakes. The shocked Hindoos instantly offer considerably more for the serpents to be released, which the fellows accept, and then go off and transact the same business somewhere else.

Cheltenham, England, is a very enlightened town, especially noted for its many excellent schools. And yet the whole town is worked up over the alleged appearance of an old lady's ghost who wants to show somebody where she buried £500 before she died. The municipal authorities, under the advice of the ghost, have offered £50 to any one who will find the treasure; and regular "ghost trains" are run in from the suburbs for the convenience of those who want to see the old lady's shade.

A new tricycle cab or "three-wheeler' has just passed the usual London police inspection and is now duly licened for hire in the streets. The new vehicle is comfortable and roomy, ladies' dresses cannot get spoiled by coming in contact with the muddy wheel, and the driver can be communicated with without dislocation of the neck. All that is needed for its success is, it is said, that passengers should be satisfied that, with its odd-looking single wheel in front, it is by no means dangerous.

Out of about one thousand students who presented themselves for examination from the Liverpool centres in connection with the Science and art examinations of South Kensington upwards of two hundred were women. Two young ladies passed in magnetism and electricity, twelve in inorganic chemistry, and two in agriculture. One lady, who passed the elementary examination last year in machine construction and drawing, was again successful in a more advanced stage of the same subject. It looks as if the Revolt of Man will have to be organized for the beginning of the twentieth century.

On the door of Prince Bismarck's study at Friedrichsruhe, are notches indicating the height of all the members of the family. They are as follows:—Prince Bismarck, 6 feet 2 inches; Count Herbert, 6 feet 1¼ inches; Count William, 6 feet ½ inch; Count Rantzan (Bismarck's son-in-law), 5 feet 10½ inches; Princess Bismarck, 5 feet 8½ inches, and Countess Mary von Rantzan, the Prince's daughter, 5 feet 8 inches. This gives an average height of 5 feet 11 inches for the whole family. But opposite the name of Princess Bismarck is a note scrawled with a pencil saying that when she was measured she stood on her tiptoes.

Archdeacon Denison lately made a vigorous onslaught on the ladies for wearing back buttons on their coats. He had always thought women cared greatly for the gracefulness of their appearance, but having watched them lately in London, he began to doubt it, and he felt so strongly about their back buttons, that if he was a little, younger, he should start an anti-button society. He amused his audience by explaining that gentlemen originally wore buttons on the back of their coats, when they travelled much on horseback, in order to fasten up their coat-tails, but he did not suppose the women of the period proposed to fasten up the tails of their skirts.

El Cronista de Morelos, a paper published in Mexico, avers that it is customary among the Indians of the Jonacatepec district of that country to exchange wives. Occasionally these trades are permanent, but more often they are for a stipulated length of time, at the expiration of which each woman returns to her former husband, and the event is celebrated in each family by a feast, at which the pulque flows freely. When the wives cannot be traded even, a dog, cat, or pig is added on one side to make the barter fair. In the district of Tenango, at Tescaliacae, the still more novel custom exists of selling or trading off mothers-in-law. A very fair article of mother in law can be bought for a lamb or sucking pig.

A Spanish shepherd killed by lightning recently was made the subject of a scientific post mortem to discover how the electric bolt had done its fatal work. His eyebrows and eyelashes were burned off, his eyeballs were dried up, all his left side was scorched and burned in spots down to the ankle, while the right side of the body and right leg were uninjured. Serious as these injuries were, none of them appeared sufficient to have caused his instant death. But as soon as the breast was opened the cause of death was apparent. The lungs were frightfully congested and the heart was enormously dilated and filled with coagulated blood. With all this damage to the man his clothing was very little injured, the only traces of the lightning upon it being a small hole bored through the rim of the hat and a slight singeing of the shirt collar.

Mr. Potter Palmer said recently to a friend: "I liked Mr. Vanderbilt because he was generous to himself. Most rich men are stingy to themselves."

The Rev. Dr. Lorimer, the well-known Baptist clergyman, tells this story on himself: "When in London, a few weeks ago, I visited a market, and asked the name of a peculiarly ugly fish that lay on the counter. 'We call them Baptists,' replied the dealer. 'Baptists!' I rejoined; 'why Baptists?' 'Because,' he answered, 'they go to the bad so soon after they come out of the water.'"

Owing to being short of help during the past six weeks, (our foreman being seriously indisposed) it has been impossible to present the Standard in as good a shape, typographically, as we would like. We trust our readers will bear with us in the matter.

Mr. Geo. Grant of this town has moved to Paisley where he goes into the old business, Sash, Door and Furniture Manufacturing. We regret to loose such a desirable citizen as Mr. Grant. He is a man of undoubted integrity, and is in every way highly respected, as also his better half. We wish them prosperity in their new home.

The wholesale Drug establishment of Elliott & Co. Toronto, was destroyed by fire last week entailing a loss of $100,000 in stock besides the building being a total wreck. It was insured for about the amount of the loss.

Our new Methodist Minister, Rev. T Hall, is an exceedingly pleasant gentleman and has already made many friends Mr. Hall, it seems was a newspaper man before he entered the ministry and he yet gravitates naturally towards a print shop.—[Lehigh Vally Echo,

Not so Slow.—As Hallowe'en comes on Sunday, a certain individual, taking time by the forelock, captured a turkey, entered a house in the village by a window while the folk were absent, and had his "hallowe'en goose" all to himself. A number of feathers and a quantity of soaked peas from its crop was all that he left.

Our brass band have been very quiet for a long time, not giving the citizens scarce any music; they turned out last Saturday evening however and gave the town a serenade which was much appreciated. Mr. Currie drove them through the principal streets in his egg wagon.

The Mt. Forest Representative is agitating for a market day in that town. It would be a great convenience in Markdale as well, so that citizens could secure a fresh supply of vegetables, butter, eggs, &c., on a stated day every week, and save farmers the trouble of peddling around their garden truck.

Let there be light.—The dry goods establishment of Hill Bro's, the Jewelry store of W. A. Brown and the new harness establishment of Thos. Mathews were all treated alike last week, viz.—to a plate glass front. This is a great improvement both outside and in. There appears to be fully twice the light inside that the old windows admitted.

South Grey Reformers.—A Convention was held in Durham last Thursday the 21st inst., for the purpose of nominating candidates for the Commons and Local Legislature at comming elections. A very large representation was present, when Dr. Landerkin was chosen for the former, and Mr. Wm. Irvine of Bentinck, president of the Association, by occupation a farmer, was elected for the latter.

Emanuel Spurgeon Wilson is the name of a "Boy Preacher" who advertises to lecture on "Heaven and its Glories," &c. He sent us a parcel of bills to poast about ten days ago, and requested us to engage a Hall, &c., for him. Not knowing anything of the stranger, we wrote him for some kind of guarantee or recommendation, but received no reply, and didn't act. We see by the Flesherton and Dundalk papers, the same humbug was billed for their respective towns but didn't turn up.

Picked up for dead.—One day last week, Jonnie Patterson, aged about six years, son of John Patterson of the Revere Hotel of this place, made his way into the Agricultural grounds where some sheep were pasturing, and among them a cross ram. The boy was missed and when found was lying senseless and the ram standing over him. He was taken home and medical aid called in, but fortunately he received no serious injuries. A few days previous the same boy fell out of a window in in the second story, a distance of some 15 feet, and escaped unhurt.

National Pills are a mild purgative, acting on the Stomach, Liver and Bowels, removing all obstructions.

East Grey.—We were surprised on reading the Meaford Mirror of last week, that any dissatisfaction existed, or could exist at the result of the late E. G. L. C. Convention held in Markdale. Capt. Joseph Rorke is in our opinion the strongest man the party has in the riding, besides his majority so great and victory so easy, that we can see no reason to call another meeting of the convention. We know nothing of the supposed irregularities which the Mirror refers to, but even they did exist, it would not change the verdict.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

The Earnest People are so few in the world that their very earnestness becomes at once the badge of their nobility, and as men in a crowd instinctively make room for one who seems eager to force his way through it, so mankind everywhere opens its rank to one who rushes zealously towards some object lying beyond them.

The evangelists left for Georgia on Wednesday.

The building was entirely consumed, but its contents and the adjoining buildings were saved by the exertions of the firemen. The fire was evidently the work of an incendiary, as the place was saturated with coal oil and ignited two weeks since, but at that time was extinguished before any damage was done.

Choice Recipes.

PARIS CAKE.—Eight eggs beaten separately, one-half pound each of butter and sugar, a tumbler of milk, the juice and rind of a lemon, a small teaspoonful of creamof tartar, one-half teaspoonful of bicarbonate of soda, and flour enough to stiffen. Bake well.

POVERTY PIE.—One large cup of milk, yolk of one egg, two tablespoonfuls each of sugar and flour, and a little salt. Cook by setting the dish in a sauce-pan of boiling water, stir until scalded, remove and let it cool, flavor with lemon, have your crust ready baked, pour in the mixture, and frost with the white of the egg and one tablespoonful of white sugar. Set in a hot oven and brown slightly.

JELLY PIE.—One tumbler each of jelly and water, three tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, yolk of one egg, a small tablespoonful of butter. Boil jelly, butter, and water together, then thicken with the egg and corn-starch wet in water. Pour into a pie tin lined with nice crust, bake till the crust is done, then beat the white of the egg to a stiff froth, adding a tablespoonful of powdered sugar, spread over the pie and set in the oven till a delicate brown.

PUMPKIN-PIE.—As no thanksgiving table is complete without the golden pumpkin-pie, the following method may be new to many readers: Pare and cut the pumpkin in pieces convenient for steaming, instead of cutting in small slices and stewing in water. Put it in a steamer and steam it till soft, mash fine and prepare in the usual manner. Separate the eggs used, putting in the yolks with the pumpkin. When done, have ready the whites whipped to a froth with a little white sugar, and spread this over the pies, leaving them in the oven with the door open for a few minutes.

Household Hints.

A feather duster is a delusion and a snare—it is simply a "flirter."

A piece of lemon is excellent for cleaning the hands.

It is a mistake to put spoons in the holder handles down.

Buttermilk and lemon juice are harmless cosmetics for removing sunburn and freckles.

Lazy people are abominations—dead weights to be carried upon some one's over-burdened shoulders.

To stone raisins easily, pour boiling water over them and drain it off. This loosens them and they come out with ease.

A very thin coat of what is known as French picture varnish will restore chromos and oil paintings to their original brightness.

After killing the chickens, while they are yet warm, drench them in a pail of cold water, and they will pick nicely, and it is so much quicker than waiting to heat water to scald them.

If applied immediately, powdered starch is said to take out many kinds of fruit stains on table linen. It must be left on the stained spot for a few hours until it absorbs the stain.

The Scientific American states that plush goods and all goods dyed with aniline colors faded from exposure to light will look bright as ever after being sponged with chloroform. The commercial chloroform will answer the purpose very well and is less expensive than the purified.

Crocks of butter to be kept for several months, says the Dairyman, should never be placed upon the cellar bottom. This causes 2 degrees of temperature in the crock, which will be at the expense of the quality of the butter at the top. The crocks will keep their contents far better if placed at least a foot from from the cellar bottom, upon a bench and a thick woolen cloth thrown over it.

Boiled eggs which adhere to the shell are fresh. A good egg will sink in water. Stale eggs are glassy and smooth of shell. A fresh egg has a lime-like surface to its shell. After an egg has been laid a day or more the shell comes off easily when boiled. A boiled egg which is done will dry quickly on the shell when taken from the kettle if fresh. Eggs which have been packed in lime look stained and show the attion of the lime on the surface. If packed in bran for a long time eggs are apt to acquire a musty smell and taste.

A French journal gives the following method of preserving grapes, as described by the inventor of the process: At the end of October cut the bunches with a portion of wood attached. Trim the base of this last to a point and stick it into a potato. Afterward spread the grapes upon straw, or very dry hay, and as much as possible so that they do not touch each other. Thus prepared, these grapes keep as well as if the stems were placed in bottles of water. An American plan of keeping grapes—and perfectly—through the winter is to pack in layers between air-dried sand and sift the whole full between the interstices. If kept as near the freezing point as possible they will remain good until spring.

Care of the Eyes.

For the care of the eyes, the following rules are laid down by a noted oculist:

Keep a shade on your lamp or gas-burner.

Avoid all sudden changes between light and darkness.

Never begin to read, write or sew, for several minutes after coming from darkness to light.

Never read by twilight, moonlight, or on cloudy days.

Never read or sew directly in front of the light, window or door.

It is best to let the light fall from above obliquely over the left shoulder.

Never sleep so that on first awakening the eyes shall open on the light of a window.

Do not use the eyesight by light so scant that it requires an effort to discriminate.

The moment you are instinctively prompted to rub your eyes, that moment stop using them.

If the eyelids are glued together on waking up do not forcibly open them, but apply saliva with the finger—it is the speediest dilutant in the world; then wash your eyes and face in warm water.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

For the first time in three or four months the members, as they assembled in Paradise Hall, found crape on the inner door. There was considerable speculation as to the identity of the deceased, but no one was certain until Brother Gardner arose and said:

"My frens, it becomes my painful dooty to announce de death of Brudder Arbutus Kingdom, an honorary member residin' in Kentucky, who passed from dis airth away las' Wednesday night arter a brief illness. He was heah at de annual 'lecshun two y'ars ago, an' won de fust prize in our games by jumpin' seben feet high. I doan' say dat Brudder Arbutus was one ob de best men who eber libed, but I know dat he was fair to medium, an' dat's sayin' a heap fur any man. In dese days of hypocrisy, theft, peculation, arson an' murder de man who keeps cl'ar of jails an' scandals has got to be a better man dan moas' people gin him credit fur. De preacher who had charge of Brudder Arbutuses funeral kinder intimated dat, while de deceased was not a purfessing Christian, de angel had gin him credit in Heaben fur a good many ackshuns, an' dat he wouldn't be chucked away into the same bin as hoss-thieves, burglars an' child-stealers. I shall take de liberty, on behalf of dis club, to send dat preacher money to buy hisself a pair of stogs butes fur winter wear. He hits the bull's eye plumb-center. He announced in his funeral orashun dat Brudder Arbutus had doubtless received credit fur—

1. Squar' treatment of his family.
2. Stickin' to de troof when he could hev made money by lyin'.
3. Mindin' his own bizness fur fifty long y'ars.
4. Strivin' fur peace between all men, an' doin' as he would be done by.

His tongue was free from lies, an' his hands from corrupshun. While he died without hevin' jined de church, he had libed up to all de p'ints which go to make a Christian man, an' de ideah dat he is to be sot off wid a lot of thieves, murderers an' blacklegs is sunthin' I can't believe in. I'ze glad to hev found one preacher who has de belief dat de Lawd hasn't divided de world into only two classes—de purfessing Christians, who am to be whooped straight into Heaben, an' de non-purfessing, who am to be whooped straight into de odder place widout reference as to moral character. De money will be tooken from de treasury an' charged up on de cash book to buildin' an' repairs, an' de Secretary will see to it dat de butes go off to-morrer by express. If de preacher belongs to any orthodox church he will sartinly be expelled fur heresy, an' he'll need de butes to hunt rabbits an' look fur a job."

REPRIMANDED.

Julius Cæsar Smith was inquired for and asked to come forward to the President's desk, and when he had complied Brother Gardner said:

"Brudder Smith, what sort of a masheen am dat you w'ar on your west?"

"Dat's a chestnut bell, sah,"

"When you start to sell chestnuts you ring dat bell, eh?"

"No, sah. I ring de bell when anybody gits off an old joke."

"Oh, I see. What effeck does it hev on de odder pusson?"

"I—I doan' know, sah."

"What effeck does it hev on you?"

Julius Cæsar shifted around uneasily but didn't reply.

"Brudder Smith," continued the President, "a pusson who am fool' nuff to pin one of dose things to his west doan' know an old joke from a new one. Dat class of pussons who cry 'chestnuts!' an' 'rats!' to give de balance of de world an ideah dat dey am smart, am really de only class widout brains nuff to keep 'em straight in de road. You walk ober to dat winder an' drap dat bell into de alley, an' de sooner you git de ideah dat you doan' know more'n all de rest of de world put together de better it will be fur you."

WILL MAKE INQUIRIES.

Prof. Caraway White, Secretary of the J. G. F. P. Society, of Nashville, Tenn., informed the club by letter that his society desired to be taken in as a branch. It numbered sixty-three members, all of the highest class of colored society, and would guarantee to send at least fifty delegates to every annual election. Its aim was to elevate and educate, and a library of over 200 volumes had already been gathered.

"Brudder Jones, wasn't Nashville de place whar' you lost seben dollars?" asked the President.

"Yes, sah," answered Giveadam, "an' in de werry rooms occupied by dat society. Some one took de money from my west pocket."

"It will be jist as well to defer ackshun until we kin make some inquiries. A society organized to elevate de cull'd race should keep its fingers out of odder men's pockets."

A CIRCULAR.

On motion of Waydown Bebee, and after considerable discussion of the matter, the Secretary was instructed to mail a circular to all branches and honorary members setting forth the fact that any one found guilty of believing in Wiggins' prophecies of earthquakes and cyclones would be requested to tender his resignation. Such belief will be taken as evidence of either insanity or idiocy, and believers will be treated accordingly.

After the transaction of routine business of no importance to the public the meeting adjourned.

Toil.

Toil is the inheritance of all by a law that is universal and inexorable and that fearfully avenges its violation. It is the command of God, and, like all His mandates, is wise and merciful. Do not grieve because others seem more favoured than yourself, for such appearances are often deceptive. With all the varied cares and duties and strange inequalities of life, we are largly, if not wholly, moulded by our own efforts, and sunshine or shadows will predominate as we may decide for ourselves. No community was ever prosperous where "wealth accumulates and men decay;" no Church ever advanced in vital piety when indolence prevailed among its worshippers; no social circle ever improved in morals, intelligence, or happiness when labour was rejected as wanting in respectability, and no individual idler ever made himself useful or gladdened a home with the wealth of content.

Essex Centre citizens complain grievously of the prevalence of the cowbell nuisance, and threaten a resort to shotguns if an effective cow police is not appointed at once.

Wm. Ross, a quack doctor, sixty-seven years of age, for arson and robbery, has just been sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment in the penitentiary at Dorchester, N. B.

For breach of promise and seduction Eliza Embree, of Amherst, N. S., nineteen years of age, has recovered a verdict of $650 against Valentine Wood, seventy-eight years of age.

The dry-goods merchants of Tilsonbury have agreed for the winter months to close their places of business at eight o'clock on each evening of the week except Saturday.

On Friday morning last there was found dead on the road above Silver Heights, near Winnipeg, a short stout man, apparently about fifty years of age. Foul play is suspected.

The five-year-old daughter of Mr. C. Wallis, of the 6th Con. of Brooke, playing with the bars at a gateway caused one of the bars to fall upon her head or neck with such force that she was instantly killed.

At the opening of the North-west Council the other day Lieut.-Gov. Dewdney stated that in 137 townships heard from in the Territories 71,951 acres of land were under cultivation, and that 1,400 acres of new land had been broken during the year.

It is stated that four Piegans, who visited the Stoney Plain Reserve, near Edmonton, about the first of the month, boasted that they had already killed this season six sheep, nine pigs, and three calves, and that as the cold weather was coming on so that meat would keep they intended to commence killing large cattle.

The Coaticook, Que., Observer states that:—"People in the rural districts are being swindled by a young woman who sells cloaks by the instalment plan and collects $2 at the time of delivery. A confederate follows and claims the cloak was stolen, giving its number and proof. The victim loses the cloak and two dollars."

The Edmonton Bulletin says there are prospects of a larger catch of fur during the coming season than even that of last year, especially of lynx. The price of lynx, however, has materially declined, and it is believed that still lower figures will be reached. The demand for beaver keeps up, but rats and mink are not in good demand.

New Westminster, B. C., has just sent four persons accused of murder, for trial at Lytton. Two are Chinamen, Ah Toon and Ah Fook and they are charged with a murder committed at Holloway last fall. The other two, Peter Derosa and James Connolly, are suspected of having murdered an unknown man found dead near Lytton a few months ago.

Rev. William Hawkins, a colored preacher of Chatham, recently spent some days visiting friends in Brantford. Mr. Hawkins officiated on the Brantford circuit in 1858 and was instrumental in securing a confession from Moore and Overend, the negroes who murdered the mail carrier near Brantford about forty years ago. The venerable colored preacher was a very old friend of the late Andrew Lucas, and himself escaped from slavery in 1839.

A tenant on Mr. Johnston Brewster's farm, near Oak Hills in Northumberland county, disappeared one night last week with about a thousand bushels of grain. Mr. Brewster lived on the same farm and in the same house with the tenant. He was there on the night of the flight but knew nothing of his loss till the morning. It is estimated that not less than 15 teams must have been employed in moving the grain, and where it has gone is still a mystery.

An old settler writes to The London Free Press:—"The oldest bridge in the county of Middlesex is across a stream that empties into the Thames on the farm of John Tait, Ekfrid. It has to my knowledge been in use for fifty-two years; has never had any repairs nor even required any, and to all appearance is good for 20 years to come, as it yet appears to be quite sound. This bridge consists of one black walnut tree."

Samuel, the twelve-year-old son of Mr. John Smith, of the 10th concession of Bentinck, died suddenly on Saturday last. The boy had been assisting at logging during the forenoon, and appeared to be in his usual good health. At noon he went to the house, and when dinner was ready went out and called the men, and then started back towards the house. He had gone but a short distance when he dropped. Assistance was immediately rendered, but it was of no avail, as he died in a short time, foaming and frothing at the mouth. It is thought that he must have eaten some poisonous root or herb while out in the woods.

A girl, about 15 years of age, arrived at Bracebridge a couple of weeks ago and proceeded to distinguish herself in various ways. She visited the Public School, and had the courtesy of the teaching fraternity extended to her on the ground that she taught a private school at her home in Midland. She hired livery rigs, and ordered goods which she never called for, with great industry, and generally exhibited such remarkable enterprise that it was thought well that a constable and magistrate should wait upon her and advise her to return home, which advice she judiciously accepted.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

No one was ever corrected by a sarcasm, but oftener driven farther in the wrong direction. In teaching always be kind and patient.

More hearts pine away in secret anguish for the want of kindness from those who should be their comforters than for any other calamity in life.

The images with which the mind holds converse may uplift or degrade as truly as companions in bodily form. A thought may scar the soul as a weapon leaves its mark on the flesh.

Duty is a power which rises with us in the morning and goes to rest with us at night. It is co-extensive with the action of our intelligence. It is the shadow which ever cleaves to us, go where we will, and which leaves us only when we leave the light of life.

True benevolence seeks the benefit of its object; true affection finds its highest happiness in loving; true excellence is most concerned about the value of its work. These make the fewest claims, yet it is to them that gratitude, love, and appreciation flow in spontaneous and abundant streams.

The doubting, distrusting, and unbelieving are among the most unfortunate and pitiable of all classes of people. Have faith in yourselves, in your fellows, in your home, in your religion, in everything that has capabilities for good. Deceit is a prevalent vice, and it will often grieve you; but it is vastly better to mourn over disappointment than to allow indiscriminate distrust to make you generally miserable with yourself and all about you.

Guards Against Earthquakes.

If earthquakes should become common on the Atlantic coast, the construction of buildings would doubtless be improved in consequence. The character of the buildings in San Francisco has been in a great degree determined by such a cause. Brick and stone buildings are more massively constructed, iron tie-rods and chains built into the walls are more used, and the fire-limits are more restricted than they would be, and the city is built to a greater extent of wood. The immense Palace Hotel makes a constant boast of being "earthquake proof"—a claim which is ridiculed by some old residents who have seen the effects of great earthquakes in Central America, and even in California, where in Inyo county, traces are yet to be seen of an opening in the earth extending many miles, which closed, leaving fences, trees and buildings displaced to an extent of several feet. In providing against earthquakes, the city has perhaps incurred a still more serious risk of a great fire. Many frame buildings are carried to a height of five or six stories, and bay windows and heavy cornices abound everywhere to such an extent that the city looks almost as if especially designed for a bonfire. Besides this, it is built on hills, and is subject to high winds daily through the greater part of the year. It is to be hoped that good luck and an excellent fire department will save it from destruction, but the risk is serious.

PECULIAR DREAMS.

Visions that Have Been Realized in Experience.

A case of a dream involving the discovery of hidden treasure is found in the annals of France during the reign of the Merovingians. It reads like a veritable fairy story, and when one considers that it had been handed down from a period antedating the dark ages, this is not to be wondered at. King Goutrand, so runs the narrative, was a noted hunter, as monarchs in those days are apt to be, and wandered up hill and down dale, far and near, in search of game. One day, when he was hunting in the forest of Touraine, he became weary and lay down upon the border of a little mountain rivulet and went to sleep. His head, upon whose breast he was leaning, soon dropped into slumber, and dreamed that he saw emerge from the mouth of his master a small white animal, which ran back and forth as if endeavoring to ascend the stream.

He extended his sword to serve as a bridge, the strange animal crossed to the other side and entered into a recess in the opposite mountain, reappearing almost immediately, however, and returning across the sword to the King's mouth. At this point the hunting of the approaching hunting pack awakened Goutrand, who appeared much vexed at the interruption of his slumbers.

"Why did you awaken me?" he asked. "I was just dreaming that I crossed a river on an iron bridge, and that I entered a cavern filled with rich treasure."

The 'squire related in turn his own dream. The novelty of the circumstances so impressed the monarch that a short time afterward he ordered the mountain to be explored, when an immense amount of wealth was discovered.

It is a familiar fact that matters occupying the mind during hours of wakefulness are reproduced in dreams when the mind is buried in slumber. This is especially true in regard to affairs of serious moment or subjects that have previously demanded severe mental attention. In proof of this may be cited the dream of Tartini, which led to the composition of his famous work known as the "Sonate du Diable"—the Devil's Sonata. The celebrated composer after vainly endeavoring to finish a piece fell asleep in his chair. The subject followed him in his sleep, and he dreamed that he again applied himself to his task, but without any apparent success. He was in the deepest despair. Suddenly the Devil appeared before him and proposed that he should complete the sonata provided the musician would surrender his soul in return for the favour. Tartini, without the least hesitation, accepted the proposition, and his Satanic Majesty at once proceeded to execute the long desired sonata in a charming manner on the violin. As the concluding strains fell upon his ear the composer awoke in a transport of delight, ran hastily to his desk and noted down from memory the piece which has rendered immortal the name of the Italian violinist.

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT that Coleridge's "Kubia Khan," that "vision of incoherency," was dreamed by the poet and written out afterward, up to a certain point, when he could remember no more. Hermas stated that it was while he slept that he heard a voice dictate to him his celebrated treatise, "The Shepherd." Dante's "Divina Commedia," according to the most reliable assurance of some, was suggested in a dream. Voltaire imagined one day that he had dreamed the first canto of his "Henriade" different from what he had written it, "and said in a dream," he writes of this singularity, "things which I could scarcely have done when awake. I must therefore have had thoughts and reflections in spite of myself and without having taken the least part in them. I had neither will nor liberty, and yet I associated my ideas with propriety sometimes with genius."

We close with the account of a dream and warning of death—which recently occurred under the observation of the writer. Of the reliability we stand ready at all times to test. In the relation names are suppressed for the reason that the individual concerned would scarcely deem it proper to be brought before the notice of the public in connection with the matter. Mr. George W—— on the morning of March 31, 1886, related at the breakfast table a dream he had the preceding night. "I saw mother last night," he said. "I saw her just as plainly as I do anything this moment. She was dead, and they were just putting her into her coffin. This was at eight o'clock. After breakfast Mr. W—— went up town, and in less than an hour received a telegram announcing the death of his mother. He could not possibly have received any intimation of her decease before, as her home was 200 miles away, and there was no direct telegraphic communication, and the death only took place the preceding evening. Indeed, Mr. —— was not aware that his mother was ill, for, though an old lady and an invalid, she had been for some time in remarkably good health. Of the causes that produced the dream, we can vouchsafe nothing. Of this, as well as other instances cited in this article, we say in the words of M. D'Argand, biographer of Mary Queen of Scots, "We judge not; we only relate."

Direction of Others.

Other things being equal, the leader of men or women who has himself borne the heat of their toil and discipline will be far more successful than one who has not. He knows by personal experience what the real difficulties are and how they can be surmounted. He has but to draw upon his memory, to realise the situation, and to decide how much can reasonably be expected. Then wherever it is possible, it is certainly wise to gain a thorough knowledge of the business in hand by actual work before assuming the direction of others. In some employments this is absolutely indispensable.

"I wonder what makes these buttons burst off so?" Dora petulantly exclaimed. David looked at her tight dress. "Force of habit, I think," he said, softly.

Spectator—"What a perilous position that painter is in. I think I would lose my senses at such a dizzy hight. I could never stay there." Friend—"Quite true. I don't know the painter, but it requires a man with a clear head to stand on that scaffold."

RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER V.—(CONTINUED.)

'twas the Providence of the moment that e trifling rope that he had had so much culty to release himself from passed over s face and hands, and that he was able to ep it with the hand that was disengaged.
wrap it by a movement of that hand veral times round his wrist was the work an instant: and then Gerald felt himself his fair charge dragged through the ter in the wake of the Rift.

Then came the challenge of the Spray and guns that were fired at the Rift, and the alteration in the turn of the smugglers' ile it was in progress—brief as that peri-d was—brought her to, and it was in that ef moment that Gerald was able to reach e little cabin window and, in a suppressed ice to call upon the French captain:

"Sir, sir! Help me! O help me!"

Captain Mocquet uttered a wild, bewilded cry as he flew to the cabin window; it as a cry that was no doubt well heard up-n the deck of the Rift; but, fortunately, e had uttered so many that no attention as paid to it, and the fog continued to be thick that unless one of the crew had ked carefully over the side of the cutter, at was there passing at its little cabin
indow could not be observed.

In fact, the attention of the captain and ew of the Rift was so entirely taken up by e Spray, and what would occur in regard her, that Gerald might almost have alked with Marie over the bulwarks on e deck and scarcely have been noticed.
Captain Mocquet saw him.

"Dieu, Dieu! Dieu!" was all he said.

"Pull in," said Gerald.

"My child?"

"No—I think not."

"Yes, yes! Oh, Dieu! yes!"

"For heaven's sake, pull in! Now take e!"

Captain Mocquet pulled at the rope and erald was raised out of the water with Marie on his left arm. The French captain aught her by the head, and then by one m, and the small, delicate form easily ssed through the aperture into the cabin.

Captain Mocquet was not then unmindl of Gerald: he only paused to strain to s heart once the body, as it seemed, of s daughter; and then, with his eyes oodshot and perfectly dry and hot now—r his grief was too great for tears—he lped Gerald into the cabin and flung his ms about him and kissed him tenderly.
t he did not speak.

"Tell me," said Gerald, "is this your—?"

"Hush, my Marie sleep! She shall sleep e long sleep! Marie! Marie! Marie!"

He knelt by her and rested the fair head on his knees and bowed his head over her d shook as with a strong convulsion, but e did not weep.

"Let us try to recover her," said Ger-
d. "I have seen many who have been arently drowned, on the coast where I e lived so long. She may not be dead."

Captain Mocquet looked at him, and the ad in that look Gerald thought he would ver forget. But without another word he nt to the locker of the cabin and with the ade of his hatchet he wrenched a drawer en—for it was locked, and there he found at he knew was there ready—a case of ttles containing various spirits and corals—which Dolan kept for his own special nsumption.

It was more by signs now, than by words at Gerald intimated to Captain Mocquet at he meant to make an attempt at the storation of Marie from her state of appar-
t death.

The father pressed his hand for a moment d kissed him on the cheek, and then let m do as he pleased.

Gerald raised the head of the young girl n his arm and gently chafed her neck and roat, and then he placed on the pale lips me of the ardent spirits from one of the por bottles.

Gerald then looked in the eyes of Captain ocquet and gently removed some portion the light night-dress that the girl wore d gently chafed the region of the heart.
was for permission to do this that he had oked in the eyes of the father; and then e lips of the French captain quivered, and gave the permission—not by words, but a gentle kiss on Gerald's cheek, and then e on his hand.

Gerald was deeply affected. For a mont or two he could scarcely see the face
Marie for his tears. They were as a mist fore him.

Yet, what is that he hears? Is it a sigh?
s. There is a faint movement, too, of e young limbs—a shudder—she surely es! She is in the arms of one who es her. She lives—she lives! God of aven, she lives!

Then the father—oh, that poor, poor ther!—with short screams and frantic cries, e strains her to his heart, and then Gerd—him, too, he clasps, and holds to his east—then his dear child again. She has rned toward Gerald, and she has flung r arms about him, and is resting her ek upon his breast. Life's ensign unfolds lf upon her cheek. She lives—she lives!

And now the fountain of her father's tears unsealed again, and he sobs like a child,
d a deep sleep comes over Marie.

"Take her, sir," said Gerald, softly—ake her. She had better sleep. She will e quite well when she awakes. God be anked for all this!"

Captain Mocquet sat upon the floor of the tle cabin of the Rift, and Gerald placed Marie in his arms, and he nursed her gently, cking her to and fro, while his tears fell ntly upon her. And Gerald then went to the little berth that opened from the bin, and brought some of the bed-clothes at were there, and helped to wrap them out her, and Captain Mocquet looked up him and smiled.

What was ship, cargo, francs—what was e to him—compared with that young life at had been rescued from the wild sea?"

CHAPTER VI.

THE AMERICAN YACHT IN PORT—A MYS-TERY.

While these events were taking place off
e coast of France, the Nautilus, with its American flag fluttering to the breeze, was beating up the Channel, making for the port of Falmouth, and carefully feeling its way through the fog which hung over the coast near France and extended for many a mile over the sea.

The day was considerably advanced when the Nautilus left the Lizard Point on its port and beat up the roads to Falmouth.

Then it was that Captain Morton, her owner and commander, came from his cabin and looked paler and more anxious than any of his crew had ever seen him, placed a glass to his eye and took a long survey of the coast line before him.

"Dare I hope?" he said, sadly—"dare I hope? No—no—it is scarcely possible; and yet how strange it is that there should ever be a something at my heart which seems to whisper consolation to me, and that there may yet be in store for me a happiness that I shrink from contemplating, lest the bitterness of disappointment should be more than I can bear."

Those were young days for the stars and stripes of the United States to flutter to an English breeze in English waters; and the shrouds of the guard-ship in Falmouth Roads were crowded to look at the Nautilus as she glided lightly on her way.

Then there was a proud look on the fine face of Captain Morton, as he saw an officer on board the English frigate lift his cap, and he returned the salute courteously.

"Mr. Andrews," he said to his sailing captain, "this is the first time that I have been in an English roadstead. What can we do in the way of a salute?"

"Everything, sir. Seven guns will be handsome. We have four, and by the time the fourth does its work the others will be loaded and ready."

"Do it, then."

Another few minutes and the Nautilus was enveloped in a cloud of its own smoke, and seven smart reports from the little carronades had awakened the echoes of Falmouth Roads.

The captain in command of the guard-ship looked with a smile at his first lieutenant as he said:

"That's well done."

"Very well, sir."

"Return it then—only I think we can make a little more noise."

The lieutenant smiled, too, and then there was a shrill whistle on board the guard-ship, and a hoarsely shouted command, and seven of her great guns boomed in thunder over the sea.

The Nautilus sped then its bird-like way toward the shore, and was soon in Falmouth harbor. The little boat of the yacht landed Captain Morton at some stone steps, down which a gentleman, whose hair was as white as snow, was slowly descending. This gentleman and Captain Morton met on these slippery stone steps with the green weed clinging to them. One side of the steps was open to the sea and the other protected by the wall of that portion of the harbor. Captain Morton, with a courteous gesture, went seaward, and then the gentleman with the white hair lifted his hat and smiled sadly as he said:

"I thank you, sir; but I am tolerably used to these steps."

"I am a perfect stranger to them," replied Captain Morton. "but—but—"

"Ah! I see what you would say. Youth and dangers that appal age and decrepitude; but it is the suffering of the soul, sir, that has blanched these locks, not age."

As he spoke the gentleman with the white hair drew himself up erect, and Captain Morton saw that there was a latent fire in his eyes, and an expression of resolution, as well as of suffering, that deeply interested him.

He, too, had suffered, and there had passed over his heart one of those storms of grief that leave their impress forever on the outward man.

An eight-oared galley at this moment reached the foot of the stone steps, and by the respectful manner in which the oars were held aloft, and the whole turn of the affair, Captain Morton could see that the white haired gentleman was somebody of importance.

They passed each other courteously and then the captain of the Nautilus heard the white haired gentleman say:

"Mrs. Havocks, what was the salute about?"

"An American yacht, sir, saluted the guardship, and it was returned."

"Quite right—quite right."

"And that, sir, is—"

The last words were lost to Captain Morton; but by what followed he guessed that they alluded to him, for the white haired gentleman turned upon the lowermost of the stone steps and cried out:

"Sir, will you pardon me for calling you back, but I am told you are owner and commander of the pretty little yacht yonder, which so courteously saluted our flag. May I hope for the favor and honor of your company to dinner with me at six o'clock?"

"With pleasure, sir."

"And I address."

"Captain Morton, United States Navy. I have the honor to speak to?"

"Sir Thomas Clifford, Admiral of the station."

A bow from each, and the two gentlemen departed, and then the sad look came back to the face of Captain Morton, and the gloom of settled grief crept again over the fine features of Sir Thomas Clifford.

One of the seamen who had rowed Captain Morton on shore now lingered for orders, and the captain, turning to him, said:

"You will go seaward after making an inquiry for a little bay called St. Just's, and then you will put in and look out for me, as in all probabilities I shall make it by land, and you will see me on the coast."

The American captain then took his solitary way into town.

It was getting late in the day, and he had not much time to spare between then and the hour of his appointment with Admiral Sir Thomas Clifford; but still he thought that he would be able to make the inquiry that he came to make, and taking from his pocket a scrap of an old newspaper, the well-worn condition of which showed that it had been frequently consulted, he slowly read its contents:

POSSIBLY INTERESTING.—An uneasy sensation has been created in our town by the death of a woman named Cole, who has resided for a considerable time in the neighborhood, close by the sea, and whose mode of life was mysterious and secret. With no ostensible means of livelihood, she was never known to do any work or to solicit charity, but yet has resided for more than ten years in a cottage for which she paid a regular rent most punctually as the day came round. On her death bed this woman accused herself of being, with a man named Hutchins, instrumental in the wreck of an American bark named the Sarah Ann, and she died in a sad state of mental prostration. It was impossible from the incoherent character of her ravings to make out what exactly she meant, but much of her self-accusations seemed to relate to a Mrs. Morton and a child named Jessica or Jessie. Our worthy coroner did not think that an inquest on the remains of this self-accusing creature was required.

Such was the newspaper paragraph which the captain read to himself in a low earnest tone.

Alas! how often he had read it to himself in the same low, earnest tone.

"This," he said with a deep sigh, "this from the Falmouth paper, after all these weary years of grief, the only faint light that heaven has vouchsafed should fall upon my blighted heart in relation to the subject."

He sighed deeply.

The piece of newspaper was then carefully folded up and replaced in his pocket; and he stood in one of the narrow, ill-paved streets of Falmouth, wondering in what precise direction he should commence his inquiries in relation to the statement which had appeared in the paper.

There was a feeling on the mind of Captain Morton—he knew not why or wherefore—making him wish to conduct the inquiries which he had crossed the wide Atlantic to make with as much secrecy as possible.

So strong was that feeling that he would not resist it, but just let it have its way: for he was a man who believed that we are all under the beneficent eye of a watchful Providence, which does nothing in vain and without an object.

"Heaven direct me!" he said.

His fingers still clutched the little piece of newspaper, on which was chronicled the name of one so dear to him; and as he strolled on, he reached the termination of the street; and the evening depening in its gloom he felt the cool rush of sea air and found that he was at the upper portion of a narrow, tortuous thoroughfare that led down to the beach.

It was by an instinct, rather than by any reflection, that Captain Morton strolled slowly down this narrow, dim looking route to the sea.

Fate was leading him through thick darkness up to the sunshine of his life.

CHAPTER VII.

WHISPERS OF LOVE IN THE CABIN OF THE RIFT.

Return we to the Rift, which was battling its way through the surging sea with the Spray; striving in vain through the fog to trace its progress or its presence.

Captain Dolan had by far too much experience of Channel weather not to be perfectly sure that the mist in which he was now enveloped was a land one, and that it would not extend many miles out into the Channel.

His object, then, was to get so far ahead of the Spray, before emerging from the fog, that she would not be able to overhaul him, or by some one or other of those tricks, audacious and daring as they were, by which he had before succeeded in deceiving and eluding the vigilance of government cruisers, to make good his escape.

Little did he imagine how strange a scene was taking place in his own cabin. To be sure, he was just a little surprised at the quiescent condition of the French captain; but he was by far too busy on deck to give more than a passing thought to him or his affairs.

Dolan whispered his orders to Ben Bowline and Martin, and they at once set about the carrying them out.

They were very curious in their results.

The long, thin, yellow streak that was just below the bulwarks of the cutter was slowly peeled off, and proved to be nothing but a piece of painted leather, which could be glued on at pleasure, and at pleasure removed. Beneath that the Rift was all of a color, namely black.

The next thing that was done was to bring up from below some long pieces of painted and covered railing which were quickly fixed aft on the bulwarks about the stern so as to give that portion of the cutter quite a novel appearance.

Then a general shift of the ballast took place, which altogether altered the trim of the vessel and changed the rake of the masts. A couple of fresh sails were bent, one of which was of a peculiar bluish color; and take it for all in all, nothing could very well look so dissimilar to the Rift, as it was about half an hour before, as the Rift at the then present time.

Every one of the crew made some change in his attire and Captain Dolan put on a white neckcloth that he took from his pocket and a black frock coat that was brought to him from the forecastle.

A piece of painted canvas was fastened just below the stern railings on which was painted "The Susan, Plymouth."

"That will do," said Dolan. "Keep all clear and we shall soon be out of the fog."

"Ay, ay, captain!" said Ben Bowline. "And if any one is sharp enough to know the Rift in her present trim, why, all I can say is, that he almost deserves to have her."

"I think she will do."

"Sure of it, sir. I suppose that—that—"

"That what?"

"It will be share and share alike with the Frenchman's money box."

"Yes, two shares for me and one for the Rift."

"Ay, ay, sir! That's all right."

"And all expenses of the voyage paid out of the common stock, of course, first."

"Yes, captain, that's only right. I may tell them that?"

You may. "Ah! that is sudden."

The ship sailed out of the fog as suddenly and as quickly as if it had passed from air to water; and although the light of that dim and wintry season was neither strong nor bright, yet the sense of change to actual daylight was very marked and strong.

The sea was rather in a commotion, and had the appearance that it wears when wind is coming or going. There were dark patches, too, of miles in extent, on the surface of the water—shadows were they of the dim clouds surcharged with rain or snow, that swept between earth and heaven.

The Rift with a surging dip went on its way; for it was crossing in a chopping fashion that washing, heaving sea which sets across its course.

Not a soul was to be seen.

"We are alone as yet," said Captain Dolan, "thanks to the fog. Keep an eye south'ard. Martin."

"Aye, sir. We shall have her soon."

"The Spray?"

"Yes, sir. But she won't know us, and we shall be asked, mayhap, if we have seen the Rift. I should heave to, sir, if she gives the order."

"We will—we will. Keep her as she is, while I go down below."

There was one of those awful sinister-looking glares about the eyes of Dolan as he uttered these words, which generally preluded the wicked thought or the wicked act of the man.

The old seaman saw it.

"Captain Dolan!" he said.

There was a something so new and strange about the tone in which the old man spoke that Dolan started and looked anxiously at him.

"What is it, Martin?"

"I don't know, Captain Dolan, what you may be thinking of, but if I was you, sir, I wouldn't hurt so much as a hair of the head of Captain Mocquet."

"Ah!"

"No, sir, I'd land him. There is enough on all our minds already. Not a soul of the crew but is full of the glooms about the crew of the Coquette, for fear they shouldn't get well on shore."

"Well on shore?"

"Aye, captain."

"Why—why—what? Are you mad?"

"Not quite, Captain Dolan. Not quite, but we couldn't stand it, sir; and we didn't."

"Stand what? What in the name of the fiend are you talking of?"

"Why, sir, while you was down below in the Coquette looking for plunder—and I hope you got something—we got up the crew of the Coquette, and started 'em off in their own boat, and told em' not to say a word for their lives' sake—and away they went."

Captain Dolan bit his lip ferociously.

"Then they were not drowned in the Coquette. They did not go down with her."

"Not a bit, captain. We are smugglers—we do a bit of piracy, too: but Lord bless you, we is tender-hearted as so many babbies we is. So you see, captain, we dont want any harm to come to old Mocquet."

"Now by all that's—"

"Hold, captain. Heave to a bit. Hilloa, mates? What say you now; do you want Captain Mocquet to be sent to the old Jones locker before his time, or don't you?"

The smuggler crew gathered together, and Ben Bowline, in his deep, growling voice, said:

"No, Dolan, no. We won't have it! We don't mind stealing the revenue—we don't mind a little sea piracy, in the way of helping ourselves to a few stores, and so on; but we don't like the look of murder."

"Dolan's countenance turned a shade blacker, as he made a desperate effort to control his passion and to get up a smile—which, when he did contort his face into it, had a most diabolical look about it. It was with an affection, then, of wonderful good-fellowship that he cried out:

"Well, well, my lads, all's right; we sail together, and we smuggle together, so we ought to hold together in such little matters as you mention."

"Ay, ay, captain," added Ben, "and we don't, you see, want to hang together."

"Ha, ha! Of course not. That's all right and ship shape. I won't do old Mocquet any harm, only I happen to have a few words to say to him. That's all—quite friendly. Trust me! All's right—all's right."

Captain Dolan paused while the hatchway top was removed, and then he plundge down toward his cabin.

Before Captain Dolan reaches that cabin we will take a glance at our three friends who are there and at the posture of affairs as regards the father and daughter and the gallant Gerald.

Marie slept calmly and composedly for more than an hour, during which Captain Mocquet did not stir hand or foot; but when she moved a little and showed signs of awakening, Mocquet, in a low tone that could scarcely be heard at all, but which, no doubt, mingled with the slumbers of the young girl, sang a little pastoral air of the sunny plains of Languedoc, and when she opened her eyes it was with a sad smile upon her face that she said:

"Ah, I dreamed of home!—of dear home—and the vines. I dreamed of home!"

Captain Mocquet folded his arms about her and held her to his heart and Gerald got as far away as possible, for he heard that Mocquet was whispering rapidly to her and he saw that she started several times and that her eyes were slowly beginning to be turned towards him.

That the French captain was relating to his daughter the history of her danger and of the manner in which she had been saved from death Gerald could not doubt, and a bright flush came to his cheek as he felt conscious how the grateful heart of the father would praise and speak of his share of the transaction.

The whispering ceased and Marie struggled to her feet and then she appeared to recollect that she had on but the night-dress in which, by a miracle, she had floated from the sinking lugger, and a soft, warm blush mantled her cheek and brow. It was then quite a pleasant thing to see how Mocquet arranged about her the coverlet that Gerald had brought from the berth in the cabin, and how picturesque and like some little savage queen of some fair island of the Southern Sea she looked with such drapery about her.

And then, with pretty, stately walk, she went up to Gerald, and for a moment he forgot the Rift, the Spray, the Coquette, the sea, the dear old cavern where he had sat with his sister Grace for many a day and year—all that before was treasured as the fondest records of his mind and fancy—for the soft arms of the young girl were about him and her tresses were upon his cheek.

Poor Gerald!

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

1. "Our Father, who art in Heaven."
Father of Lights and God of Love,
Thrice Holy is Thy name;
Thou King of Kings, enthron'd above,
Thou ever art the same.

2. "Hallowed be Thy name."
Forever hallowed be Thy name,
By hosts in earth and Heaven;
In heathen lands make known Thy fame,
And saving mercy given.

2. "Thy Kingdom come.
Thy kingdom's stretch from pole to pole.
Throughout earth's utmost bound;
Till gathered in each blood-bought soul,
That on the earth is found.

4. "Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven."
Thy will be ours from morn till night,
Obedient to Thy Word;
Then shall our path be clear and bright,
And sin shall be abhorr'd.

5. Give us this day our daily bread."
That man shall nothing be denied,
Who truly seeks Thy face;
Our earthly wants are all supplied
With bounty, love and grace.

6. "And forgive us our trespasses."
Our sins and failures we confess;
On bended knee entreat;
Thus, trusting to Thy tenderness,
We'll worship at Thy feet.

7. "As we forgive them that trespass against us."
And may Thy love our hearts incline,
To mercy bend our ear;
To pardon others who combine
To cause us needless fear.

8. "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."
From Satan's tempting snares of sin,
Thy right hand shall deliver;
Our God shall keep us pure within,
Though Hell's foundations quiver.

9. "For Thine is the Kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever."
Thine are the kingdoms of the earth,
And thine the glory ever;
This world did own Thee at her birth,
Thou everlasting Giver.

10 "Amen!"
Amen! amen! so let it be,
God's counsel faileth never;
The Truth of God is pure and free,
And shall prevail forever!

SUNDAY CONTEMPLATION.

Those that are greedy of praise prove that they are poor in merit.

Nothing is so strong as gentleness, nothing so gentle as real strength.

No woman is educated who is not equal to the successful management of a family.

He that is afraid of solemn things has probably solemn reason to be afraid of them.

There are those who never reason on what they should do, but on what they have done.

One good act done to-day is worth a thousand in contemplation for some future time.

Nature is frank, and will allow no man to abuse himself without giving him a hint of it.

The great high road of human welfare lies along the old highway of steadfast well-doing.

When the forenoons of life are wasted there is not much hope of a peaceful and fruitful evening.

We complain that our life is short, and yet we throw away much of it, and are weary of many of its parts.

Whenever anybody makes haste to do wrong they are very apt to stumble. If people were as ingenious as they are wicked, rascality would rule the world. But they generally lack ingenuity. Boil it down as you will there is nothing smart in meanness; honesty is pretty nearly genius. I have sometime thought that a perfectly honest man could fool almost anybody.

The Fly as a Purifier.

Of what use is the troublesome customer? The fly does his part in the great and important work of purification, seeing with his 10,000 eyes things that would pass unnoticed by us, eagerly devouring his appropriate food. This he finds in the smallest atoms of animal and vegetable matter, too small to be noticed by the tidy housekeeper, which otherwise would be permitted to putrefy contaminating the air. We may imagine that he circles about in the air with no definite object in view, but if we will carefully watch him we shall be convinced that he has an object, collecting his food, atoms of impure or decayed matter which otherwise would enter our lungs, adding to the impurity of our blood. This filth is collected on his wings and head with his legs and feet, passing the gathered morsels from foot to foot, the front pair passing his dinner to his mouth. The fly also teaches us the value of sunlight, not only to cheer but to purify the air, for he has too good sense to live in a dark room. When the parlor is darkened he seeks a decent place for his release.

A woman always tells a secret to some one because she is afraid she might die and then there would be no one left to keep it.

MARKDALE, OCT. 26, 1886,

OUR VILLAGE.

That Markdale is a healthy substantial and vigorcus business centre, goes without saying. It progresses slowly but constantly, and is fiilng up year by year with a substantial class of buildings, chiefly brick, and each succeeding year surpasses former ones in quality and architectural beauty.

Its location is a most desirable one, being neither flat nor hilly, but suffi ciently rolling for good drainage. The water is excellent and abundant. The railway station just near enough, five minutes walk from the centre. Our buisness men are enterprising and progressive; market always steady and reliable, thereby drawing a large and constantly increasing trade from the surrounding country.

Our citizens are, with very few exceptions, industrious, prosperous and hospitable, but, under the circumstances quite too content, being bled to the tune of at least $600 a year during the past 10 or a dozen years, by the townships of which we form a part, in the shape of taxes (township rate, Licenres, Fines, &c.,) over and above the regular rates, and that without any return. Our village has expended some $1.500 in sidewalks, &c., during that time, but never a dollar did we receive from the muicipalities into whose treasury our tithes have been paid, but raised the amount from the village by special tax independent of the regular township and other rates. Now this kind of thing is growing monotonous, and as there is no prospect of bettering our condition without a change of municipal relationship, the sooner our village seeks and obtains incorporation the better; this would secure for our town an influence and position of advantage in many respects, besides creating an increased interest in its prosperity and welfare generally. As to the cost of a village council it is customary for such councils to give their time gratuitious with the exceptions of the Clerk and Treasurer, and we are satisfied that less than one half of what we now pay out without getting any return for it, would pay all costs of maintaining such municipal expence while the other half could be used for local improvements, or for improving roads leading to our village.

GENERAL BOOTH IN OWEN SOUND.

General Booth is the founder of the Salvation Army, and is now on a tour through Canada, having arrived in Toronto from London, England, some three weeks ago. The Army in Owen Sound have been twice burnt out, but have apparently came to stay, having this summer erected a brick barracks about one hundred feet long and fifty feet wide, which will seat 600, and costs about $5,000. The General was invited to O. S. on the occasion of the dedication of the barracks, which took place last Thursday. The services were enthusiastic and largely attended.

THE NORTHERN RAILWAY

A recent trip over the N. and H. & N. W. Railway by C. P. R. officials has renewed the belief that an early change in the management of that road will be made. This would include the Callandar branch which taps the main line of the C. P. R. shortening the distance by all rail route from Toronto to Winnipeg by several hundred miles. Business men along the N. and H. & N. W. are anxious for the change, as the line is not being efficiently managed of late.

Will there be a general election this Autumn? This is the general question. The Tories are reserved and the Grits are puzzled. Here is a grand chance for the immortal Wiggins. He might have more luck with a political prognostication. Let us hear from the Professor.

A MODERN MIRACLE.—In a recent letter from W. R. Dowson, of Deloraine, Ont., he states that he has recovered from the worst form of dyspepsia, after suffering for fifteen years; and when a council of doctors pronounced him incurable he tried Burdock Blood Bitters, six bottles of which restored his health.

Polygamy still exists to an alarming extent in Utah, and the State Governor's report, just issued, states that the Mormons, who number five-sixths of the population stoutly maintained an attitude of defiance to the law of Congress. The United States has a great evil to grapple with, but the spirit of the people is to continue to fight until the abominable custom is wiped out of the land. Probably one of the best means to the end is the work that is being conducted by the Christian denominations among the younger generation of the State. The Sunday-schools are still flourishing despite immense opposition.

A COMPLETE BREAKDOWN.—"For ten years" says Jennie M. Harrett, of Wallaceburg. Ont., "I did not see a well day—was all broken down with dyspepsia, liver complaints, catarrh and debility. Three doctors abandoned hope for me, when Burdock Blood Bitters came to my rescue. It is the best medicine I have ever taken. I say this for the benefit of all suffering as I did.

An editor died and slowly wended his way down to where he supposed a warm reception awaited him. The devil met him and said: "For many years thou hast borne the blame of bad spelling your printer has gotten off in the paper, the paper has gone out for $1, but alas the $1, has not come in. The printer has bedevelid thee for wages Saturday night when thou hadst not a farthing in thy unpaid-for pants. Men have taken thy paper without paying for it and cursed thee for not having a better one. Thou has been calleda dead head by freight conductors and a dead-beat by the passenger conductors when thou has shown thy annual pass to their envious gaze. All these things hast thou borne in silence. Thou canst not enter here." and he fired him. "Heaven is his home and besides if I would let him in here he would be dunning delinquent subscribers and thereby creating much discord in my kingdom."—Ex.

HEHD CHE BILIOUSNESS—"Whenever I feel outoof sorts, bilious, my liver not working right, or racked with a headache I take Chase's Liver Cure, There is more real benefit from one dose of your Liver Cure than in many bottles of some medicine," —John McNasser Bond Head.

Oil your Boots and shoes.

The efficacy of oiling depends much upon the way it is done. In the evening brush the shoes clean, and then wash it with lukewarm water, rather to moisten than to clean it. Set it where it will dry slowly. It should not be perfectly dry the next morning, when the oil is applied, but feel damp not wet however. The best mixture for oiling shoes is made of one-half of neat's-fool oil—be sure you get the genuine article—one-third beef tallow, and one-sixth castor oil. Mix thoroughly over a gentle heat. Depend upon the rubbing rather than the heat to get the oil in—to express it differently, two parts of rubbing and one of heat. If the shoes are pegged, as farmers' shoes usually are and always should be, get the oil in well between the uppers and the sole; it will prevent the sole pulling loose, or the leather breaking away from the pegs. Shoes at farm work should be oiled at least once a week. It requires only a few minutes to do the work, and it is decidedly profitable labor.—Americas Agriculturist for November.

THE FOUR CARDINAL POINTS.—The four Cardinal points of health are the stomach, the liver, the bowels and the blood. Any irregularity of their action brings disease and derangement to the hole system. Regulate their condition with Burdock Blood Bitters to secure perfect health.

"I don't love you, and I won't marry you!" she said to him in a pet. "Two negatives an affirmative, my dear; let's go and see the parson," he answered, quietly. She went.

Advertise the Truth.

Stick to it when selling, give customers value, live on fair profits, and success is ensured. All is not Gold that glitters. It is easy to be deceived on Watches, &c. I AM 8 YEARS IN BUSINESS last week, and from the steadily increasing patronage of the public, I feel to conclude they appreciate my efforts to deal right, and to establish myself in their midst as a RELIABLE JEWELER. My heartfelt thanks are due to all for liberal support, and I trust for a continuance on the basis of honest representation on every article sold.

Maxwell.

From our own correspondent

Mr. Robert Gordon who was at his home here on a two months' furlough, has returned to Ransom, Mich., to re-enter on his ministerial duties. He drove this time, as he wishes to use the horse to convey him between his two appointments which are seven miles apart. He has with him the best wishes of his Maxwell friends.

Mr John Clark has also gone over to Michigan for the winter.

Miss Lilly Long, daughter of our postmaster, is now away teaching the New-England school, near Kimberly. She is relieving the teacher, who wishes to attend Model School.

Mr. George Preston, of Newboro, Co. Leeds was up last week on a visit to his brother, D. K. Preston, Esq. He was accompanied by Mrs. Preston

There has been considerable sickness about here lately, mostly among children, but I am pleased that it has almost disappeared. It was a kind of fever.

Rev. W. E. D'Argent is just recovered from a severe attack of inflammation of the lungs. I was glad to see him out the latter part of last week.

Missionary meeting will be held next Sabbath in the Methodist Church here; In the morning Rev. Mr. Flint of Singhampton will preach, and in the evening Rev. Mr. Vickery, of Ravenna, will occupy the pulpit.

Mr. C. A. Chant, I learn, has resigned his position as teacher here. He has been here now almost three years, and I understand will resume his studies next year. His successor has not yet been appointed.

There have been some complaints about here that the Fall Fair prize list have not been published, and I believe the majority will be willing to consider them general news.

Last Sunday evening as Misses Maria and Aggie Gamey were driving home from church in the extreme darkness, the horse wandered from the road, and there was an upset in the ditch, fortunately however, with no serious result.

Mr, Thomas Maxwell is the proudest man in town, an increase in population last Monday.

Feversham.

From our own Correspondent.

Well, Mr. Editor, it is some time since you have heard from our rural town, so I will send you a few pointers this week.

Rev. L. Hall has returned from Michigan where he has been doing ministerial work. He likes the U. S. and looks as though it had agreed with him.

Mr. Wm. B. Burk, of Brougham, son of Mr. R. Y. Burk, is on a visit together with his newely wedded wife. Will looks immense.

Miss Maggie Shore has returned from Palgrave: She has been visiting at Mr. McGirr's, also Miss Mary Bailey who has been visiting her sister Mrs. L. Hall, has returned home to Toronto.

We are highly pleased to hear that our excellent teacher, Geo. Mitchell, has been engaged for another year. Salary $500.

Mr. Samuel Irwin of Dundalk has been out here purchasing cherry. Mr. H. Perigoe our jolly sawyer has the contract of cutting and skidding seven thousand feet.

Messrs. Mitchell, McGirr and McAleer, were out hunting the other day, taking arms and amunition sufficient for a regiment of soldiers, and, with the assistance of McLeod's Prinnie dog, they captured two squirrels.

Mr. Thompson Allister is home. He has been engaged in the carriage making business near Georgetown.

Artemesia Plowing Match.

The plowing match came off as advertised, on the farm of Mr. R. Oliver on the 19th inst. The weather was delightful and a large number of spectators were present. The number of competitors was not as large as was expected, owing doubtless in a great measure to this being the first under the auspices of the township Ag. Society.

At a meeting of the directors held at Flesherton Station on the 23rd inst. the following resolution was passed, viz: Moved by A. Stewart, seconded by D. McMillen and resolved, that the thanks of this board are due and hereby tendered to the several parties who contributed so liberal in the matter of prizes for the plowing match.

The Fall season brings with it many necessities which cannot and will not be neglected. Bernardina's Lover.

BY LOUISE ALEXANDER.

"Well, what do you make of it?" asked Mr. Jack Maunder, as he laid down his brush and palette and folded his arms, as though to brace himself for the reply.

"Not much," said a very pretty young lady, as she closed her book with a delightful little yawn, and with both ruthless hands rumpled her blonde bangs out of all their smooth symmetry. "With the thermometer at ninety," she murmured, "the gifted heroine was a trifle fatiguing; we are informed she is epigrammatic without hearing any of her smart speeches; then the hero—evidently he is the long-haired poet of the future—but with none of his poetry on exhibition. By the way, Jack," suddenly turning upon him eyes that were like blue flowers, "what interest had you in the book?"

"None in the world," said Mr. Maunder, morosely, "except that I wrote it."

"Why, you clever old boy," exclaimed the young lady, rousing into animation at this announcement. "Then there must be something in it," she said, cheeringly, "else they would not have published it, would they? You didn't have to pay them to print it, did you Jack?"

But Mr. Maunder, under this soothing criticism, was rapidly packing up his artist's paraphernalia, with an accession of gloom, patent to Bernardina's blue eyes—"clear windows where observation sat laughingly."

"I think you are not very polite, Mr. Maunder," she said, with pointed formality, "to leave my questions unanswered, when I have made myself quite stiff, posing for "Titania" all the morning."

"You are always laughing at me, Dina," remonstrated the young fellow, in a tone of sulky complaint, which produced an exaggerated appearance of penitence in the incorrigible Miss Ray.

"On the contrary," she said, with a wicked little gleam of the blue eyes, "I feel a sort of reflected glory in having the honor of your acquaintance, you delightful dilettante young man."

So Mr. Maunder pulled at his moustache in a wrathful state of indecision, and swallowed his resentment as best he might. He was a tall, slender young gentleman, with a sufficient share of masculine good looks to subjugate the average feminine fancy—a course of conquest he had been wont to pursue, until Bernardina Ray had revolutionized all his past experience. She was so entirely unlike every other day lady he had hitherto encountered, with her delicious, tormenting frankness, and gay spirit of mischief. That she lived in a different world from his own, was only an added allurement to the already infatuated Mr. Maunder.

What moments of intoxicating bliss he had spent within that little vine-covered cottage, where dwelt Bernardina and her widowed mother; or better still, the hours passed upon the grassy slopes out side, while he painted Bernardina as Titania among the fairies, but in reality she resembled more a Dresden shepherdess in bisque, with her intense blue eyes and finely-grained complexion.

Already Mrs. Maunder, whirling away the summer days at Newport, had received faint intimations of her son's latest infatuation, and apprehension became confirmation strong as proofs of Holy Writ, when Jack boldly expressed his request that Miss Ray should receive an invitation to his mother's garden fete.

On the whole, Mrs. Maunder, with all her exclusive patrician pride, concluded to concede this card to Miss Ray, if only as an expedient by which she might be enabled to criticise this rustic beauty.

Her son was undoubtedly an emotional young man with an artistic tendency, and a susceptibility to the charms of young maidenhood, particularly alarming to the mother who adored him.

And if her maternal solicitude was of a somewhat worldly character, she had proved her confidence in her only son by an allowance so liberal, that obviously nothing more practical could have been expected of him in the way of achievement, that a few paintings of dubious commercial value, or a trifling little rhyme now and again for one of the magazines.

Mr. Maunder had displayed much diplomacy about obtaining the invitation to the garden party; but his sense of complacent satisfaction was changed to something very like dismay, when, he discovered there were futher obstacles ahead.

"I suppose a faded blue organdy, or a white one of remote antiquity, would not be exactly appropriate for your mother's lawn?" said Bernardina, with less than usual of her gay good humor. Somehow that bit of pasteboard had opened vistas of exhilarating possiblilities to Bernardina, shut up in her world of books and maiden dreams as she had been, until the chance advent of this deferential young prince of the gay outer world.

He had won over the quiet mother, by the charm of his frank youthfulness and courteous bearing, and to Bernardina he had come as a revelation of youth and congenial comradeship.

The summer days had drifted on with ever-increasing confidences between these two, and that perfect absence of constraint which a more conventional acquaintance might have engendered. Scarcely a day passed without their meeting, and to-day Mr. Maunder was intent upon gaining his point. Bernardina should go to the fete.

"Beauty is like a rich stone, best plain set," he quoted sagely, with his young eyes looking unutterable things. But Bernardina knit her pretty brows crossly. "Thanks," she said, shortly, "only I should prefer some of the baggage of virtue, once in a way." And then Bernardina looked as though she were quite out of patience with the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune."

"Let me buy you a dress, Dina," said Jack audaciously, but blushing the while at his own temerity. "It would be a purely business affair. I am sure you have wasted enough time, posing for 'Titania'"—

"Thank you," said Bernardina, as if she were not in the least obliged, however. "My self-respect is worth ever more to me than a new dress, Mr. Maunder."

But this loftly attitude was not natural to Miss Ray, and she was already a little ashamed of her ill-humor.

"You are a good fellow, Jack," she said, unbending into a smile, and extending her hand with a graciousness which Mr. Maunder was not slow to accept with a servile and abject show of satisfaction.

"I have read about girls making themselves picturesque out of old window hangings and their grandmothers' dresses," said Bernardina, after this reconciliation. "Mother," as that gentle lady appeared in the doorway; "Have you any ancestors, or brocaded dresses, hidden away in your trunks up-stairs?"

"I fear not, my dear," said the mother, smiling quietly, as her eyes always did when they rested on Bernardina. "But there are those dimity gowns, that have been lying away ever since you were a baby, Dina—if they would be of any use."

But Bernardina was already away.

"You are worth a dozen ancestors, mother dear," she cried gayly, as she disappeared.

Presently then, behold Mr. Maunder, seated modestly beside the window with a pair of scissors grasped firmly in his hand. and a mass of dimity before him, prayerfully anxious to be helpful in the work of demolition; for as Bernardina grandiloquently put it, "dispatch was everything."

That was a joyful week, with Jack and Dina running races down the seams, both of them in the wildest spirits, while the placid mother sat smiling as she sewed. What would have been Mrs. Maunder's emotions, could she have beheld her son at the mercy of this young Delilah?

. . . . . .

"Now be candid with me, Jack," said Bernardina, upon the eventful Thursday, as she turned slowly and seriously about for Mr. Maunder's inspection. "Do I look amateurish? Have I a home-made appearance?" with a consuming anxiety in her blue eyes, and an evident distrust of her own charms. "I have a painful misgiving that it requires to be pulled tight in front, to make it fit right in the back; and vice versa," she went on, with a somewhat nervous laugh, while Jack pulled at his moustache, and looked profound.

"In other words, it fits too much," agreed Jack, with a suspicious readiness of assent.

"Then you show very bad manners to say so," said Bernardina, with some inconsistency, but great spirit. But her indignation soon melted under the stress of weightier emotions. "And I have a burning doubt about the set of this off sleeve," she resumed, returning to her anxieties under the exigencies of the occasion.

"Now, Jack, I put it to you, as a man and a brother—is there not a suspicion of bagginess in that sleeve?" with a bewitching backward glance over her shoulder.

But Jack, having learned discretion, was not to be entrapped a second time. He raved over the success of their united efforts, and appealed to Mrs. Ray to sustain the veracity of his statements; and when he had exhausted his vocabulary, rather sheepishly he produced a slender parcel and proceeded to unfurl a handsome sunshade.

But Bernardina speedily relieved him of his misgivings.

"Why, you delightful creature!" she cried, with her blue eyes smiling dark and brilliant from beneath the lace border of the parasol. "You have quite restored my self-respect, and made it possible for me to fancy myself one of Worth's confections."

So Bernardina ate her former words with perfect cheerfulness, and was whirled away to the fete in a state of complacency, second only to Mr. Maunder's sense of satisfaction.

Arrived at the scene of festivity, people were not slow to discover this new beauty, who was the obvious object of Mr. Maunder's devotion. If the ladies were inclined to be critical about the set of her gown, the men found no such barrier to their admiration—and in point of fact, Bernardina did look sufficiently charming in her simple ceam-white gown, with folds of tulle caressing the white column of her throat, and the big bunch of roses beneath her dimpled chin vying with the color in her cheeks. For once at least Bernardina drained the intoxicating cup of social success, with a gay and whole-hearted enjoyment which some pronounced the perfection of art, and the masculine element declared to be adorable. But it was over; and next morning poor Jack had to hear his sister's criticisms at breakfast.

"Fancy my feelings," said the eldest Miss Maunder, with dignity, appealing to her mother for sympathy; "when I showed her Jack's picture of 'The Sylph,' she asked me if I did not think the legs resembled champagne bottles—and half a dozen people standing around."

"If I knew her better," said another Miss Maunder, stifling a yawn, "I should advise her to change her mantuamaker."

But this was too much for Jack's equanimity. Before his mental vision arose a picture of Bernardina, with her pretty perplexed face and hopeful gayety, while she planned and contrived the costume which these worldlings now would criticise.

"Mother and sisters," he said rising manfully to the occasion, "I should like you to know that the lady you are discussing I intend, if possible, to make my wife." And then he was gone, leaving this thunderbolt behind him. But his head was in a whirl as he took the well-known road to Bernardina's.

He would ask her to marry him that very morning—his pretty darling, who was worth a dozen of those cold-hearted conventional creatures; but he would let them see—he didn't exactly know what, but he kept up his resolution, until he had poured out his heart at Bernardina's feet.

But Bernardina took the recital very coolly. "Should you feel justified in marrying against your mother's wishes, when you are dependent upon her bounty?" she demanded a little scornfully. "May I inquire what other means you have to marry upon, Mr. Maunder?" She asked with a portentous calm.

But this was a practical question which visibly discomfited Mr. Maunder, and tended to check the flowery rhetoric of his declaration. He even looked a little foolish.

"I have some sort of a farm in Virginia, but I've never seen it," he admitted sulkily, after a somewhat blank pause.

And then the storm broke.

"Then my advice to you is, Jack Maunder," she said bitingly, "to learn how to earn your own bread, before you invite a wife to share it with you. Do you think I would thrust myself upon an unwilling family, and ask to be supported? Not I, Jack Maunder. My own poor mother ruined her whole life, by just such a marriage as you invite me to make; but because I have been foolish and happy and light-hearted, I am not altogether lacking in common-sense; and sooner than marry the way you ask me, I'll live and die and old maid, Jack Maunder."

With which awful declaration Bernardina came to the end of her breath, with several emphatic shakes of her head, and her blue eyes flashing dangerously.

"At least you have not spared me any," said poor Jack, with his lips trembling boyishly under his long, fair moustache; and under the reproachful gaze of those miserable brown eyes all Bernardina's scorn vanished.

"Show yourself a man, Jack," she whispered, with her cheeks flushing suddenly, "before you ask me to prove how well I love you."

There was less danger of misunderstandings now, with his fond arm about her waist and brown eyes gazing deep into blue ones. So they exchanged their views and vows of deathless faith and constancy, and then Jack went boldly forth, to wrestle with the virgin soil of Manitoba. And when Mrs. Maunder discovered that this astonishing development of manliness and independence in her only son was due to the influence of the spirited young lady who would not marry him otherwise, her opposition gave place to a genuine good feeling, which time and a closer acquaintance have not altered.

Bernardina and Jack have been married now ten years. A little procession of lads and lassies go tripping about the old farmhouse, like miniature copies of their blue-eyed mother.

Jack has forsaken the fields of fiction for those of agricultural reform, and they are very happy. They have all grown to love their free, healthy home life, where Bernardina reigns, the "joyful mother of children." In her, Jack still retains unlimited faith and love—happy Bernardina!

Kill the Cat.

A father on the occasion of his son's marriage gave him a little special advice. "You are going to be married, my son; and you will wish that your wife should be quiet and submissive to you in all matters. Follow the advice which I now give you. Procure a cat, and one night after your marriage so arrange that the animal shall be in your sleeping room at the time you and your wife retire to rest. You will go to the room as usual, and on entering it you will pretend to be very much surprised and annoyed that the cat should be found there, and you will draw your sword at once and slay it. Your wife, of course, will be terribly frightened, and from the sight of the slain cat, and a hint from you that she will fare likewise if she is not very careful over herself, you may depend upon it that she will be the proper, dutiful wife that she should be."

"Must you leave me?" she asked, and clutched his encircling arm and tightened his grasp. "Yes, my darling," he said, "dearly as I would love to stay, I must go." "Business?" "Not exactly." "Why must you go, then?" "Because," he replied, gently moving away from her, "I want to go down and play a game of billiards. I must have more exercise."

YOUNG FOLKS.

A TALK ABOUT BRIDGES.

Before we begin to talk about stone bridges, let us name the different parts of an arch, as nearly all our stone bridges are arched.

The stones of which the arch is made are called voussoirs. The one at the top is called the keystone, and this point is called the key or crown of the arch. The lowest stones are called the springers. The large three-cornered spaces above the sides of the arch are called spandrels. The walls or masses of masonry in the water, on which the arches are supported, are called piers. Those which are against the bank are called abutments. The low wall which is built on each side of the top of the bridge, to keep people from falling off, is called the parapet. The distance between the ends of the arch is called the span. When you read that an arch is of fifty feet span. it means that a straight line between its ends would be fifty feet long.

An ordinary bridge must be prepared for the attacks of four enemies; first its own weight; second, the stream that it spans; third, the people who use it; fourth, the weather.

It is sometimes a very nice problem to plan a bridge so that the weight of the stones will make it stronger, and not weaker. In order to be strong, an arch must have something immovable to brace its feet against, and its crown must be as heavy that it will not be pushed up into the air by the pressure of the sides.

Suppose two boys stand back to back, and spread out their feet, so that together they make a sort of letter A, or arch. Suppose they are near the side of a large room, where the first boy can brace his feet against the wall. He will now find it very easy to maintain his position so long as the second boy can maintain his. But the second boy, with nothing to brace his feet against, will find it very tiresome; no matter how hard he digs them into the carpet, they will be in constant danger of slipping away. But now we will put two more boys in similar position, and place them so that the feet of the second and the feet of the third will come together and brace against each other. This makes all the boys comfortable except the fourth. We will add another arch to our bridge by puting in two more boys, and now they are smiling except the sixth, who bites his lips and wishes we would hurry up with the next arch. So we put in two more boys, and then two more, till we have extended our bridge entirely across the room, and the last boy can brace his feet against the wall. This makes everything secure.

But suppose one of these arches is made of two small, light boys. What will happen? Why pretty soon the feet of the small boys will begin to give way and be pushed by the feet of the large boys pressed against them, till the small boys are brought up standing, with their heels together as well as their backs, and the two arches of large boys will have settled down in the same proportion.

This will enable you to understand a difficulty that is sometimes met in building a stone bridge of several arches. Of course the two end arches will each brace one foot against the bank, which we may consider immovable. The piers may be so thick and heavy that of themselves they will sustain the pressure or "thrust," as it is called, of the other sides of the arch. But sometimes it is necessary to make the piers so high and narrow they cannot do this; and if one arch were built at a time, its pressure would push over the pier. If the arches are all of the same size and form, and we build them all at once, they can brace their feet against each other and be just balanced. But sometimes the formation of the bed of the stream is such that the piers cannot be placed at equal distances apart, and so the arches cannot be all alike. Sometimes the balance is maintained by making the short spans lower arches than long spans. In a low arch the pressure is more outward than downward; in a high arch it is more downward than outward. In our bridge of boys you will find that if two large boys forming an arch stand nearly straight, spreading their feet apart only a little way, while the small boys forming the next arch have spread their feet far apart and brought their bodies nearer to the floor, the two arches will balance just as would two equal arches of equal-sized boys. You see every one of these boys is sustained by two things: the floor, and whatever he braces his feet against. The straighter he stands, the more he is sustained by the floor and the less by the wall or the feet of the next boy; the lower he gets, the less he is sustained by the floor and the more by the wall or the feet of the next boy. In other words, the straighter he stands (and consequently the higher arch he makes), the more the thrust of that arch is downward; when the lower he gets, the more its thrust is outward. In the bridge we can also put an extra amount of stone over the small arches; but here we must drop our comparison, for we don't want to put any big stones on the head of small boys.

Sometimes an arch must be very small, to make room for the water to pass in time of floods, and yet it is desirable to have the top of the bridge as low as possible, so that it will not be necessary for teams or trains to go up or downhill in passing over it. This makes the masonry very thin and light at the crown of the arch, and the weight of stone in the spandrels might throw up the key. Occasionally this difficulty has been overcome by making the spandrels hollow—that is, by making large round or arched holes through them. This not only lightens them, but makes additional passage-way for the water when it rises high. A very pretty example of this is afforded by the Bridge of Pont-y Pyrdd, over the river Taff, in Wales. Of two bridges previously erected at this point, the first was carried away by a freshet, and the second fell by its own weight, the masses of masonry in the spandrels throwing up the key. The present structure is a single span of one hundred and forty feet, and has three round openings in each spandrel. It has stood firm for a hundred and twenty years.

The piers of a bridge must stand parallel with the current, and should be as narrow as they can be with safety, so as to present as small a mark as possible to its natural enemy, the stream. This is all the time trying to undermine them and to break them down, and during a freshet it often happens that masses of ice against them with tremendous force. For this reason they are made sharp at the up-stream end. Sometimes a separate breakwater of wood or stone is built to protect each pier; and these are often placed at a little distance from the piers; because if they rested against them whenever they were struck by a log or cake of ice the shock would be communicated to the bridge, and in time this would loosen the masonry.

Every load that is driven over a bridge has a tendency to shake it down, and the faster it is driven the more effect it has. When you drive a nail with a hammer, if you bring the hammer down slowly it will not drive it as far as when you bring it down quickly. If you make the hammer twice as heavy, or bring it down twice as fast, it strikes the nail twice as hard; if you make the hammer twice as heavy, and bring it down twice as fast, it strikes the nail four times as hard. Now, if the top of a bridge could be made absolutelv smooth, as smooth as glass, and if the wheels of the vehicles were perfectly smooth and round, it would make no difference how fast they were driven. But this can never be. The wheels must always meet obstructions. These may be the edges of pavingstones, or the ends of planks, or the pebbles of gravel, and whenever they do meet an obstruction they first strike it and then mount and go over it. Every such stroke is like the blow of a hammer on the bridge, and the effect will be according to the weight of the vehicle and the rate at which it is moving. A load of three tons moving ten miles an hour will strike six times as hard as a load of one ton moving five miles an hour. Railroad bridges are so heavy and strong that no load which is ever likely to cross them will have any perceptible effect. But bridges cannot be made so, and hence the signs seen, even on new bridges—"Ten dollars fine for crossing faster than a walk."

NEGRO SUPERSTITION.

"De Angels Am A-Rappin' at De Do'" Curse of the Colored Race.

The Charleston newspaper correspondents tell us that the frightened colored people sung themselves to sleep on the hymn which begins with the above words on the night of the earthquake. It is said that their singing was wondrous. Intelligent men, familiar with the history of earthquakes, and knowing that the worst was over, endeavored to console the wild, bewildered and panic-stricken race, but they would not be comforted. All seemed prepared and anxious to go. The negro race is a mystery even to the whites who have been raised with them. It seems that neither time nor experience can eradicate their credulity and superstition. But few feel themselves safe without some sort of talismanic protection. They believe in all sorts of conjuration, and are miserable at the loss of their bag of charms. Superstition is so deeply engraved in the fiber and ligament of their natures that they only regard the conjurer as an impostor when he exposes his own tricks. They are amiable, generous and kind-hearted, but superstition is a curse of the race. They have and the proverbial rainy day never dismays them. They live in a country where lands are productive, and can make a comfortable living, but they skim along and enjoy life as they find it. They care for nothing for reputation, and generally those who has been in the penitentiary is ostracized. They have no avarice and seldom conspire to swindle but with them an agreement is binding, no contract more binding longer than agreeable and convenient.

LITTLE OR NO THRIFT;

The religious demonstrations of the negro at Charleston during the earthquake were in keeping with the race. Their religion is usually entirely emotional and spasmodic. They are pious to excess at times, praying night and day; then they go to the other extreme. Their ministers are popular in proportion to their power to induce in their congregations a condition of ecstasy rather than for the excellence of their precepts or the uprightness of their examples. In their meetings they sing uproariously, beating time with their feet, and the noise grows louder and wilder, until the whole congregation seems to be as crazy as the inmates in an asylum. Piety is judged by the noise, and those who yell the loudest are the most religious, and those who get struck down senseless, breathless, stiff, and purple are regarded as sanctified.

LONG AFTER MIDNIGHT

the shout and the music swell, like the wave together and the billowy roar rolls unto the sea. The sermons are a fervid description of heaven and hell, the resurrection and the judgment. The tumult is great and wild, and often the singing is magnificent.

The colored children learn in the public schools with the rapidity of the white; it seems impossible for the race to darken their minds of superstition and religious fanaticism, the former a curse to the latter a mockery of religion. Under whatever condition the negro is found, his religious instincts are sure to be strong. It is a crude religion for the most part. It is a strange blending of what is pure and elevating with a mass of error and superstition, a religion partaking of a highly emotional character. A quiet, orderly, undemonstrative religion would not suit them. They want a noisy, shouting, soul-stirring kind, one that affords an opportunity for the display of animal enthusiasm. And the more the preacher is the showy, demonstrative, sensational character, with powerful lungs and maniacal gesticulations—the man who can yell "hell-fire" with such vehemence as to alarm the night watch and call out the fire engine.

A musical exchange has an article on "Silent Music." The worst of it is that there is altogether too little of the article.

"I stayed down town to-night to look over my books, my dear," hiccoughed Mr. Pipkin, the major of the family domicile, when he entered the house at 2 A.M., and found her sitting in a chair by the table with a child in her lap and wearing a very forbidding expression of countenance. "Well, if that hasn't made them balance, that is more than I can do for yourself," was her sharp rejoinder.

Performance and Pretension.

English writer pertinently puts the tion. "Would not the world be wiser and happier if we were to lay it down as a general rule that performance is nearly proportioned to pretension?" Certainly he convinced of this, and to know others also were convinced of it, would be a salutary lesson to those who now waste so much of their energy and life in trying to appear what they are not. Insincerity of this kind is not only wrong, it is foolish, so impotent, so short-sighted that we wonder how any reasonable intelligent man or woman can adopt it.
It serves very few, and those few only for a time. It prejudices persons against those who practices it, so that they are willing to admit his actual merit.

FARM.

Scissored and Penned.

The Country Gentleman has a correspondent who claims that tarring seed corn prevents its coming up.

The best time for soil pulverization is the autumn, because the frost will then penetrate the earth during the winter.

The farmers of this country waste enough feed each year to winter as many animals as they keep; that is, by saving all food and feeding it judiciously, they would double their flocks and herds.

Sound potatoes dug in dry weather need little drying, and if it is required let it be in a dry shady place, where it is as cool as possible, and as soon as they are dry they should be stored in a cool, dark place. Potatoes should be handled carefully; rough handling is more or less injurious to them.

Prof. Stewart says; Apples are not only not objectionable, but are beneficial to the health of the cow, and improve the flavor of her milk—with the qualification that they are properly fed. A moderate quantity of apples, say six to eight quarts to a cow per day, will assist in the digestion of her other food, and their flavoring will improve the taste of milk.

Many farmers look with distrust on the chemists' estimate of the money value of a fertilizer, and we observe that some agricultural papers instead of trying to present clearer views on the subject, are inclined to throw out surmises and objections and hints, calculated to increase this want of confidence. This is wrong. The farmers who get cheated are seldom those who place the most reliance on the chemists, but rather those who "don't care a continental for your analysis."

Do not forget to give the cellars a thorough and effectual renovating before commencing to store vegetables and fruit. Too much care cannot be observed in this. The health of the family, as well as the preservation of the articles stored, requires this work. Brush down all the cobwebs on the walls, clean out all the accumulated dust, and give the walls and ceilings a coat of whitewash. The fruit, vegetables, and all the musty smells will be removed from the most useful and necessary apartment on the premises of the farmer.

A fall campaign against weeds and bushes is more efficacious than one in the spring, though I would not be understood as advising the farmer to let the weeds steal a march on him in the spring, by any means. Yet if there is no growing crop to be injured by their presence, I am not certain but that, if they are allowed to grow to the point where they begin to form seeds, and are then turned under, they will receive an equal check, with less expenditure of labor, than if they are hacked down all summer. In the spring, vegetation has a strong vitality and recuperative power, but in the fall, when forming seeds, its force is somewhat spent, and it is susceptible to injury.

How to Get Rid of Sheep Ticks.

R. M. Bell of Missouri tells how he gets rid of sheep ticks as follows:

We got as much linseed oil, Scotch snuff, tallow, sulphur, burnt umber, and pine tar as would answer for the whole flock. Three of us went at the job of handling each sheep separately, one at a time, to cover every part of its body with the mixture we made up of the above ingredients. We had no rule as to quantities of each, except the umber and tar, of these very little of each—tar only to give a piney smell quite perceptible to the sheep; of umber just enough to give a slight color. Each of us had an iron pan and a scrubbing brush. Over a little fire we had an iron pot with our mixture in to keep it warm. We had a stake driven into the ground solid, with a staple and ring at the top end, some eighteen inches high. Through this ring we passed a leather strap that was put around the sheep's neck. At first it was a job quite new and odd to us, and one that we did not care to have company catch us at, as there was a slight sense of fraud about it that we did not care to face before everybody. We greased every one of those sheep and lambs from end to end, and from top to bottom, and turned them into the pasture. They looked just alike in color, and did all the year. The little coat of tallow and tar—nothing more than a shadow on the end of a fiber—prevented the fleece from wetting and splitting, but in no way affected the quality of the fleece, and every tick was killed or banished by the tobacco, sulphur, and tar, and from that day to this we have not had a tick in our flock. I know now that we could have used any old grease as well as the linseed oil, and we might have used concentrated extract of tobacco as well as snuff, at the price we paid for it. It is the usual practice in England, as a precaution against flies, and among fancy breeders in America. At least to rid sheep of lice, ticks, etc., I do very heartily recommend it to owners of moderate-sized flocks.

London Leads the World.

London, with the single exception, possibly, of Rome, is the only capital in Europe where the festivities of a court are to be enjoyed. Berlin was never very gay, and now that the Emperor and Empress have become so very old the social elements of court life have become extremely primitive, as well as formal and restricted. The haughty aristocracy of Vienna decline to receive at their entertainments any foreigner below the rank of a prince, even the attaches of the different legations having but a dismal time of it. Since France become a republic the social prestige of Paris has wholly vanished.

Spain and Portugal are too far out of the beaten track, and especially the latter, and the stiff etiquette pervading at both courts renders them anything but popular. Since King Humbert ascended the throne of Italy he and his fair wife have done much to make Rome a brilliant and attractive social center. But it is now an undoubted fact that London, during the season, has taken the place which was occupied under the second empire by Paris in the affections of society lovers on both sides of the Atlantic.

Wesleyan Ladies' College, Hamilton.

The Wesleyan Ladies' College of Hamilton has entered upon the work of the year with unusually large advanced classes. The President's smallest class contains a dozen members. The graduating class of this year will be one of the largest in the history of the institution. The College aims at the highest class of work, and it invites to its halls pupils who desire to work and who can appreciate superior advantages. Specialists in music and art are furnished with rare advantages in these departments. This College has never employed agents, but although it is the oldest of the colleges and so complete in its equipment it can make its terms $160 to $200 per annum. For its efficiency and success much praise is due Rev. A. Burns, D. D., LL. D., the President.—Globe.

The great reputation of Briggs' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves.

Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Telectric Oil," Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgias Sprains and Bruises, complaints arrising from Cold, such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

Mark H. Irish, proprietor of the Rossin House, Toronto, boarded the Georgia pirvialists, Jones and Small, free the three weeks they were in the city.

THE great and the only inimitable tramp printer (Wm. H. Hicks) struck our town weary and foot-sore last Monday. We extended to him the "right hand of fellowship" and he went on his way rejoicing whistling "Tramp, tramp the Boy is Marching,"

SMALL BOY—"Mother, please give me another lump of sugar for my coffee. I've dropped the one you gave me." Mother—"Where have you dropped it?" Small boy—"In the coffee."

WHETHER it was out of respect for the Sabbath or not, we do not presume to decide, but the boys indulged in their usual hallowe'en capers on the night previous, Saturday. We haven't heard of any destruction of property, as is often the case on such occasions.

BEAR CHASE—One day last week while Messrs A. Bowles and G. Hill of the 11th line Enphrasia were chopping in the bush, a large bear put in an appearance, (looking for nuts) which started them at first, but as they had their axes, two dogs, and a little salt in their pocket, they gave chase hoping to tree the black monster, but bruin didn't tree worth a cent and was better on a foot race than any of them and consequently made his escape.

THOS. MATHEWS moves this week into his new brick shop. Mr. Mathews is one of the first business men of the place, and by close attention to business, good workmanship and honorable dealing, has built up a trade which is a credit and pleasure to himself as well as the village. He now takes a step forward, his new premises being large, substantial, comfortable and handsome, besides being in a first class business part of the town; it is perhaps the finest harness establishment in the county: has a plate glass front, which adds much to its appearance. We wish Mr. M. the success which he deserves.

NEWSPAPER LAW.—There are three points in the law regarding newspapers which every reader ought to be conversant with. First—if a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrages, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and collect the whole amount whether it is taken from the office or not. Second—Any person who takes a paper form the post-office, whether directed to his name or another, or whether he has subscribed or not, is responsible for the pay. Third—If one orders a paper to be stopped ot a certain time, and the publisher continues to send it, the subscriber is bound to pay for it if he takes it out of the post-office.

TEACHERS MEETING:—On Tuesday evening last a teachers meeting of the Methodist S. School was held in the lecture room for the election of officers and other business. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year, viz:—G. S. Bowes, Superintendant, R. W. Ennis, assistant, Fred. Stevens, Secretary, W. J. Boyd, Librarian and R. W. Ennis, Treasurer. Mr. Bowes was elected by one of a majority and that was W. A. Brown's vote. The teachers some twelve in number were all re-elected. It was also decided to have no eatables at the coming Anniversary, and to have the admission 15 cents, not hindering any from giving more however.

FAREWELL SUPPER:—It having come to the knowledge of the young men of Markdale that Mr. A. Hill the popular cutter at W. J. McFarland's store was going to leave town to enter the employment of Chisholm, of Meaford, they determined to show their appreciation of him by tendering him a farewell supper at the popular Markdale House. Mr. Marsh made his best efforts and the viands were all that could be desired. After attending to the inner man the chair was taken by Mr. P. McCullough, Barrister, and the usual tosts proposed and responded to in the happiest manner. Everyone refered to Mr. Hill's extraordinary Business and social qualities and regretted very much that he saw it in his interest to leave the town, and wished that Mr. H. would meet with the success his genial and business qualities deserved.—COM.

CLIPPINGS.

WE are pleased to notice that Mr. W. E. Gimby, of Brooke, has passed the Matriculation examination prescribed by the Ontario Medical Council, and has entered upon a course of studies in Toronto school of Medicine.—[O. S. Advertiser.

S. J. McCall, who has absconded from Owen Sound, was accountant for the Dominion Grange Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and not for the Grange Trust Limited. His bondsmen are good for $4000, which will more than pay for the defalcation.

OWEN SOUND, Oct. 27.—During Sunday night's gale the schooner Lady Dufferin broke loose from her tow, the steam barge Wm. Hall, near Cabot's Head and sank. The vessel and cargo are a total loss. No lives were lost.

OTTAWA, Oct. 26.—The Canadian Atlantic railway company has made arrangements for 500 American cars to be used in the transport of foreign grain from Chicago to Owen Sound, thence to Boston via Ottawa and the Canadian Atlantic Railway. This is 80 miles shorter than any other route. The first shipment passed through a few weeks ago.—[Mail.

A CURIOSITY.—Our townsman, Mr. R. Trotter, is an enthusiast in furit cultnre, and brought to our office the other day the greatest curosity we have ever seen in the apple line. It was an apple one half of which was of the Snow variety and the other half Pomme Gris, the division running exactly through the stem, and being as distinctly marked as if they had been the halves of two apples glued together. He obtained this result by removing at the proper time the pollen from a blossom on one tree and bringing to it carefully pollen from another blossom. He intends to preserve the seed, and see what kind of a hybird he can raise from it.—[O. S. Times.

WORTH REMEMBERING.— There is probably no better relaxing remedy for stiff joints, contracted cords, and painful congestion, than Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It cured Mrs. John Siddell, of Orton, Ont., who was afflicted for some years with contraction of the bronchial pipes and tightness of the chest. It is the great remedy for internal and external pains.

Accurate Little Girl.

"What pretty children you have," said the new minister to a proud mother of three little ones. "Ah, my little dear," said he as he took a girl of five on his lap, "are you the oldest of the family?" "No ma'am," responded the little miss, with the usual accuracy of childhood "my pa's older'n me.

A WIDE RANGE.—A wide range of painful affections may be met with Hagyard's Yellow Oil. James M. Lawrence, of Woodville, Ont., speaks of it in high terms for rheumatism, lame back, sprains and many painful complaints too numerous to mention. It is used internally and externally.

A Hint to Marry.

He was seated across the room. "Harry," she said, "if a fire broke out suddenly in the house, what would be your first impulse, do you think?" "Well, my first thought would be for you, of course. I would get you to a place of safety, and then do what I could to extinguish the flames." "That would be very nice of you, Harry, to think of me first; but if a fire were to break out now, for instance, wouldn't you loose valuable time reaching me from way across the room?".

THE SCOURGE OF AMERICA.—. The one terrible blight of our country is scrofula—from impure blood—it causes consumption and many wasting, lingering and fatal diseases. Burdock Blood Bitters cures scrofula if taken in time.

THINGS TO TEACH YOUR BOY.

Teach him that 100 honest cents make an honorable dollar.

Teach him the proper use of the first personal pronoun.

Teach him that debt is a dirt that soap and water won't wash away.

Teach him that no honest business was ever despoiled by religion.

Teach him whenever he gets into hot water to always come out with his hands clean.

Teach him, that the young fop, dude and dandy very often makes the old vagrant and beggar.

Teach him that a boy with an over-supply of pocket money, is the tadpole of the future splendthrift.

Teach him that the best employment for his capital and intelligence is to mind his own business.

Teach him that an empty-headed conceited boy, assuming the place of a man of position, is the most abominable thing in the world.

Teach him that the best earthly repository for all his joys and sorrows, is the heart of a true woman. There the one is magnified the other destroyed.

Teach him that an idle heart is a stronghold that will demands the reddition of every manly virtue.

Teach him that a life of honest industry and close economy, will yield more real happiness, than the idler or spenthrift ever know.

Teach him that an injudicious and improvident marriage, may crush out his spirit and energy, and leave him an over-wrought half-starved animal all his days,

Teach him that God will be found at the end of all, and that the permeating influence of such a knowledge, will enoble his life and sweeten his heart, and make him a blessing to many of his race.

FARM.

Feed and Shelter of Sheep.

Sheep require more nitrogenous food than any of our domestic animals, unless it be the horse. They will not grow the best fleece of wool if the nitrogenous elements are lacking. Without well-balanced food, strong healthy, muscular lambs need not be expected. They also need shelter, not only in winter, but in summer. Nothing is more grateful to the sheep than a cool, dry shade. Yet, how few sheep pastures have any kind of shade. An English experiment is given by a writer on sheep, in which two flocks of twenty each, as nearly alike as possible, were pitted against each other. One flock had shelter and the other had none; otherwise they were fed and cared for alike. The twenty that had shelter gained 273 pounds more than those deprived of it, while those which gained the most ate two to four pounds less turnips daily, and forty-six pounds less of linseed cakes. This is an instructive lesson which it will pay any man who has a herd of sheep to heed, and practice accordingly.

To Prevent Rams From Fighting.

If two or more rams are kept together, they are liable to fight, first in the spring when freshly shorn, second, toward autumn. When freshly shorn they sometimes fail to recognize each other, but toward autumn they become quarrelsome. At this latter season it is important to keep other sheep at a distance. If they are housed at night, they may be put into a tolerably small apartment; by keeping thus closely together they do not have room to harm each other, and will soon become sufficiently acquainted so that they can be driven to pasture with but little fear of fighting. Should there be one or more that feel disposed to continue their combativeness, drive them to the barn, procure a piece of leather about seven inches square—an old boot top will answer—then with a sharp knife cut it so as to form a cap, the upper part of which is placed on top of the head, between the horns; then the two points on each side together, around the horns. A little practice will enable one to fit a cap in this manner as nicely as a shoemaker will fit a boot to a foot. If necessary the cap can be drawn tight to the nose by making holes, and tying from the sides under the jaw. This cap will entirely destroy a front view, and at the same time give a side view, enabling him to travel about where he chooses. This cap, when it is properly adjusted, will stop the fighting; at least it will so confound them that they cannot deliver effective battle.

Notes.

Farmers who have sown gypsum on strawberry plants, to promote their vigor, have met some disappointing results. The gypsum produced so large a growth of clover that it became almost impossible to keep the rows clean, and in some instances the bed had to be abandoned.

Many are under the impression that fat hens lay the most eggs. This is an error. They should be kept in good condition, and no more. If too fat they become lazy and unprolific, and are liable to drop dead with apoplexy, a disease very common with overfed fowls. It is a good idea to go to the roosts about twice a month, and by feeling of the breasts of hens and pullets, it is easy to decide as to their condition. The Asiatics take on fat more rapidly than the small breeds. Give fresh meat every other day to hens, and be paid back with a plentiful supply of eggs.

The English dairymen are a head of us in some respects, says Prof. Arnold, viz: In skill in feeding, and in husbanding manure. They feed very economically. If our dairymen would economise as well, they would get rich and make their farms grow rich at the same time.

A New England dairyman states that he has fed green rye to his cows for three seasons, and the improvement in the quality of milk, cream and butter are very marked. He uses no coloring for his butter, and finds the green rye better than many other kinds of grass. Considering that rye is a crop that grows well on nearly all kinds of soil, this is very encouraging.

Skimmed milk and grass alone will raise good calves if the milk is abundant, and not allowed to become sour. When too sour it causes scours, which counteract its good effects. Skimmed milk is rich in albuminoids and phosphate of lime, thus giving a strong muscular and bony development. A little flax seed will improve it, as it prevents constipation.

Do not forget to give the cellars a thorough and effectual renovation before commencing to store vegetables and fruit. Too much care cannot be observed in this. The health of the family, as well as the preservation of the articles stored, require this work. Brush down all the cobwebs on the wall, clean out all the accumulated dust, and give the walls and ceiling a coat of whitewash.

From the fact that sweet and sour cream require different temperatures for churning, the two should never be mixed. They cannot be churned together without loss. At least 12 hours should intervene between the churning and the last addition of cream, that the whole mass may become in the same condition. Thorough mixing of the cream by stirring helps to secure a uniformity of condition, but time or oxygen is an important element in the problem.

The best way to dry up a cow is to put her in the stable and give her hay for a week, says a contemporary. Milk her every other day, in part, and rub on the udder soft soap or strong soap suds. When a week has passed turn her to grass again and milk the bag out clean twice a week and then once. When managed in this way there will not be any inflammation. These rules are for drying up a cow when there is a full flow of milk. In winter most cows will dry up of their own accord. The udder in such cases should be milked out clean, taking care to squeese out the teats, or they may get stopped up.

A carpet trade paper tells a story of a perspiring salesman who seemed to be unable to suit a lady after unrolling miles of his stock. When the lady remarked to her companion: "Baby likes to see him roll them out, and it's not time to take the train yet," he gave it up.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"Brudder Glucose Smith," said the President, as the triangle ceased its tinkling and the meeting was declared open, "I am given to understan' dat you am gwine away to visit a furrein kentry."

"Yes, sah; I'ze gwine ober to Canada."

"Werry well; de change of sights an' smells will probably do you good. I'ze glad to see you go, but I want to say a few words to you right now and yere. In de fust place, doan' emagine dat de hull United States am gwine to hold its breaf while you am gone, or be perched on de pedal of anxiety till you git back. Seberal men o' your size kin eben take de steamer fur England widout seriously blockin' de wheels of bizness or throwing a State into confusion. Dis may seem strange to you, but it am nevertheless a cold fack.

"Secondly, doan' go away feelin' dat you am de sole representative of dis kentry, an' dat you has de dignity of de United Staits to maintain. I' you hev sich a feelin' you won't dare eat onions nor drink buttermilk. Jist keep right down on de ground 'mong common folks an' a fall won't be so apt to break yer neck.

"Thirdly, doan' find fault wid de people bekase deir customs an' habits differ from ours. It would be quite accordin' to Hoyle fur you to go over to Canada an' claim dat all you saw was fifty y'ars behind us Yankees but doan' do it. Not one of 'em would believe you in de fust place, an' in de next you might hev great trouble in provin' your assertions.

"Fo'thly, fur Heaven's sake doan' go to braggin' about yer kentry an' its wonderful resources, inventions, wealth an' enterprise. A good deal of all dis kin be offset by sartin facks dat we had better keep to ourselves. Fur instance, our fooss, lunatics an' drunkards am increasin' a good deal faster dan our wealth, an' dar ain't a thousand public officials in de hull kentry who am cl'ar of suspicion. Jist keep yer brag to yerself, walk around as a private individual an' you'll come home pleased with your trip. Dat's all, Brudder Smith, an' de Seckretary will make you out a card o' membership dat will pass you into any Baptist prayer meetin' dat you happen to come across."

"Mr. Ch'rman," said Trustee Pullback as he rose up, "I rise to a pint of order."

"De pint seems to be well tooken," replied the President.

"Den, sah, I would inquar' why dis Lime-Kiln Club doan' take some ackshun on de Bulgarian queshun? It am a queshun which involves de peace of all Europe, an' I can't see——"

"Brudder Pullback," interrupted the President, "was you eber in Bulgaria?"

"No, sah."

"Do you know whar' she am?"

"N-not 'zactly, sah."

"Eber see a Bulgarian?"

"Can't say I hev."

"Den you sot down! De man who mixes up wid all de quarrels in his own nayburhood has got his arms as full as he kin hold."

FIRST REPORTS.

The Judiciary Committee reported that there was little doing in law, and what there was seemed to be all in the hands of the lawyers who were engaged in establishing the innocence of suspected men. They recommended that about half of every jury be sent to State Prison along with the party convicted.

The Committee on the Sciences had nothing new to report, but recommended such a change in the planetary system as would result in more moonlight nights. The recommendation was adopted and the club will see that the change is made. At least the President said so.

The Committee on Harmony reported that the strained relations with Mexico had limbered up until it was now possible for a Texan and a greaser to meet without wanting to eat each other up. The fishery question was still an open one, but there was no talk of war with Canada.

The Committee on Art submitted a report condemniug the nude in statuary and paintings. While they could not say that the moral effect was bad, there was no gainsaying the fact that the tendency was to ignore the clothing trade of the country.

The Committe on Finance reported that they had examined the accounts of the Treasurer and janitor and found both correct, while the money claimed to be deposited in bank had been counted and found to pan out to a cent. They had no recommendations to make, being satisfied that everybody was honest.

"We hev no confidenshul clerk employed in dis establishment," said Brother Gardner as the Chairman of the committee sat down, "nor am any Sunday skule superintendent permitted to handle our funds accordin' to his own judgment. All monies comin' in or goin' out pass frew seben different hands, an' each pusson must take and give a receipe, De key to de safe am made in fo' pieces an' handed to fo' different parties. If our cash account doan' tally up to a cent ebery day in de year you kin look out fur lower barometer an' high winds in de lake region.

PERHAPS.

Sir Isaac Walpole secured the floor to suggest that, in view of the increased length of the evenings and the large atttendance at the library it might be a good thing to form a debating society. He had belonged to several during the last twenty years, and believed himself to have been greatly benefitted.

"We will take de matter under advisement," replied the President. "I has had some leetle experience wid debatin' societies an' dis yere scar on de back of my head was de result of once bein' on de negative side when de quesshun at issue was 'What Could We do Widout Wimin?' We will decide de case later on."

A Fork in His Stomach.

The Academy of Medicine in Paris has just been listening to a report from M. Polaillon on an unusual surgical operation which ended successfully. The case was that of a young man who out of bravado had swallowed a fork. It was extracted by an incision in the stomach. For many days after the patient confined himself strictly to a diet of soup and iced champagne. Later on he took some milk, and on the twelfth day was allowed a cutlet. He is now quit well.

A Strange Burial Place.

There are countless stories of the eccentricities which men have shown about the disposition of their bodies after death. The old gentleman described in this extract from a London paper selected an unusually exalted position for his final resting-place.

Riding on the top of an omnibus down Oxford Street one can hardly fail to notice a curious object on the top of a very handsome residence some few hundred yards to the right after passing the marble arch. As seen from the road it appears to be a framework of glass, some twelve feet long by six feet broad and four feet high. Through the glass can plainly be seen a large, oblong box, painted black, which looks for all the world like a coffin.

This house, although under ordinary circumstances it would bring an enormous rental, being situated in one of the most fashionable parts of London, has been untenanted for fully fifty years past. The story goes, and I have heard it from at least half a dozen omnibus drivers who daily pass the house, that the last tenant, who was also the owner of the property, was an eccentric and very wealthy old gentleman, who served for many years under the government in India.

When he died he left a provision in his will that his body should not be buried, but should be placed in a coffin inside the structure I have referred to, which he had built some years previously, and almost every body believes to this day that the old gentleman's bones and whatever flesh may be left upon them are actually at the present moment lying in this strange receptacle.

I have made inquiries of the agents of the property and they laugh the idea to scorn that the old fellow is really upon the top of the house, but at the same time they acknowledge that the curious structure, whatever it may contain, will never be removed, and they add that although the house has been offered for years past at a greatly reduced rental, nobody can be induced to take it while the glass box and its contents remain in their present condition. This is one out of the many explanations of the curious structure which may be seen any day by those riding past Hyde Park gardens.

Dreaming.

BY J. R. WILKINSON.

Mellowly the golden sun was gliding
Adown the aisles of flaming west;
Bathing earth and sea in a sheen of glory,
As it sank majestically to rest.
Murmuringly the summer winds were breathing
A song of love to the birds and flowers;
Wooing the streams and distant woodlands;
And toying with gems in the fairest bowers.
Low were the tones, mysterious and soothing,
That came from the depths of the strange, restless sea
Whispering the soul of the great Eternal;
Far, far beyond where spirits are free.

Gently the twilight came stealing around me
Mantling earth and sea in dreamy array;
Palely the night orbs above me were twinkling,
Silvering the waters away, and away.
Serenely the queen of night in her beauty
Looked on the sea, and the isles afar;
Pointing her rays o'er the quivering foliage
To the gates of day, just left ajar!
Sweet were my dreamings alone in the gloaming,
On that summer's eve of the long ago;
Loving and trusting in meek adoration,
Quaffing from nature's mysterious flow.

Long I paused by the murmuring, sad voic'd sea,
Fondly dreaming of love, with the world at my feet;
So trusting in youth at the flush of it's morn;
Soaring high on the wings of bright hope all complete.
But darker, and denser the long shadows grew,
Deepening in gloom as the night grew apace;
Ghostly clouds hid the stars, sky, earth and sea;
And the crecent moon veiled her beautiful face.
And the wandering winds sighed and grieved,
And the waves sobbed along the dim shore;
And a voice like a prayer, a voice full of tears
Wailed pitifully, nevermore!

And I wept, yet I scarcely knew why,
Vague doubts and fears touched my passionate soul;
Like the approaching tempest heard from afar,
When its muttering thudders onward roll.
I wandered away o'er the pitiless world,
Fighting life's battle with might and main;
Amid toil and tears, through long sad years,
Weary of waiting, and all in vain.
All scathed and worn by the battle's fierce flame,
With the day uncertain, and incomplete,
Bright hope, love and fame, and friendship so dear,
Lie a pitiful wreck at my tired feet.

have come once again with the summer time,
At the evening's mystical after glow;
To the lonely sea, 'neath a waneing moon,
Where the waves still restlessly ebb and flow.
And I gaze far out o'er the shadowed sea,
Seeking for its dreamland isles afar;
But I scarcely can see for the blinding tears,
Where the beautiful sunset gates are ajar!
But I seem to see up its golden aisles,
A fairer home, 'neath immortal skies;
All bright with bloom, and the friends I loved,
On the fadeless hills of Paradise!

Dolan should see Marie and that he have in his power such a hostage for mission, both of herself and Captain et, to whatever he might choose in latitude of his tyranny to dictate, was not to be thought of by Gerald, if it be avoided, and he sprang to his feet, Marie tenderly at the same time.

Hide, hide! Oh, hide!" he whisper- "That is Dolan who is coming."

My Marie! My Marie!" cried Cap- Mocquet.

Hush! The berth! He will not go in Hush! Tell her to go there, sir. will not understand me; oh, tell her!"

Dolan did not descend at once to the Before doing so he beckoned to Mar- and while the baleful light was in his again he said:

You were not aware that in the cabin, g in one of the berths of the lugger, was—there was—"

Come—come—it is not worth while be- ly over it. Business is business, you , and my idea was to make as much as possible. I dare say you would erved me the same trick now if you d. It's only a mattter of money, and must be too well off to take much heed, of the loss of the Coquette and your and goods."

Captain Dolan," said Mocquet, in a clear voice, "you are one robber, villain! My Coquette was mine—my were mine. You had the Rift—that yours. I did not touch yours—you have mine."

Come, come, be reasonable! I have let crew go safely off in their boat."

But I want twenty thousand francs of

"Ah!"

"On one condition; which is, that I restore to you your little daughter, whom I took out of your cabin, and have in perfect safety for you whenever you choose to give me an order for the money in some way by which I can get it."

The cool effrontery of this speech, after what Mocquet and Gerald knew, was almost more than they could for the moment believe; and it was not until Dolan had repeated the words that they fully appreciated them.

"And, captain," said Mocquet, who spoke better English now under the impulse of his strong emotions than he had done before, "and captain, si, si—that is if I shall not say aye to that proposition?"

Dolan shrugged his shoulders.

"I cannot take upon myself to say exactly what I will do, but you will never see your danghter again."

"Ah!"

"You consent?"

"Non—no!" cried Mocquet, as he dealt the table a blow that made it start again.

"You will!"

"Non—no!"

The baleful look glanced from the eyes of Dolan and he muttered:

"Yes you will, and shall now leave you to consider it. Your money or your daughter, that is the question."

"Non—no!"

"Oh, yes, it is. Gerald, you will do well, as you may be some time with this obstinate man, to let him know that I am very apt to be a man of my word. The day will soon wear away and I will come to you again. By the bye, your present quarters will be changed and I shall then trouble you to come on deck, for I shall want my cabin to myself. So see that you quickly decide, Captain Mocquet, for when on deck—when on deck, ha! in a sudden passion, a moment of rage—and I am rather subject to them, if thwarted—I'll fling a man into the sea, where you will join your daughter as food for fishes."

"But you said," remarked Gerald, "that you had saved the captain's daughter."

"Eh?"

"You said you had her safely and now you talk of her being food for fishes."

"And how dared you put your oar in?" roared Dolan, as he bent a ferocious grin upon Geral. "Look to yourself, boy—look to yourself!"

"I will."

"It is as well that you should: for if I had not made up my mind to hang you, I should perhaps drown you! ha! ha! Look to yourself. I have your daughter safe enough, Mocquet—a pretty little creature, with large, fine eyes. I have her! I have her! Her price is twenty thousand francs—twenty thousand, and when you are prepared to pay them, she is yours. Think of it—I leave you to think of it."

"A sail!" shouted a voice from the deck.

Dolan hesitated a moment or two, as though he either had something to say himself in addition, or thought Gerald or Captain Mocquet would make him some reply; but as they neither of them did, he, with a muttered imprecation, made his way to the deck.

"What shall I do?" said Mocquet to Gerald. "What shall I do? He is one grand voleur, and he will go to come, and my Marie will be discovered."

"Hush! Oh, look! look!"

Through the little cabin window, by which Gerald had plunged into the sea to the rescue of Marie, they could see over the surface of the Channel, and at about a couple of miles distant, there was the schooner Spray making all sail, in evident pursuit of the Rift.

"We shall be saved yet," said Gerald. "Oh, yes! we shall be saved yet. And then, and then—"

The boy clasped his hands over his eyes and sobbed bitterly.

"Ma foi!" said Captain Mocquet. "What for you (what you call it?) cry?"

"That man is my father."

"Non—no!"

"Yes! Oh, yes! I cannot deny him—I cannot defend him; and I cannot deny him. Oh heaven, direct me! After all, that man is my father."

"I shall not believe. One father and one son shall not be as one north pole (as you call him) and one south pole is far away from the one and the other—I mean the difference—comprenezvous?—not like to like. It was not to be in the nature. Oh, non! No, no—ten times no! Bah."

Monsieur Mocquet had settled this so satisfactorily to himself that he looked quite contented about it and gazed through the cabin window at the advancing Spray with great interest.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE REVENUE CUTTER MAKES A SHOT THAT TELLS.

The schooner, on emerging from the fog, had come at once in sight of the Rift, but the alteration in the trim and general appearance of the cutter completely deceived the sailing master of the Spray, who, in the Rift, now saw nothing but a strange cutter, from which he might possibly get some information concerning the smuggler.

It was no part of the design now of the Rift to try to outsail the Spray toward the English coast, as in such a case she ran all the risk in the world of being intercepted by some government vessel that might lie between her and the shore.

What Dolan now wanted was to shake off the Spray by finesse, and by sending her on some false tack in fancied pursuit of the Rift.

When, therefore, the Spray got within about three-quarters of a mile of the Rift and fired a gun, the Rift at once lay to, and looked as quiet and submissive as possible.

Had then the sailing master of the Spray set stood so much on the dignity of a kings's ship, but had sent a boat on board the Rift, some sharper eyes than common might about the Rift; but he did not do so.

While the smuggler lay to, the Spray soon sailed over the distance between them and then Mr. Royle hailed through his trumpet:

"Cutter, ahoy?"

"Aye, aye, sir!"

"What cutter?"

"The Sarah—port of Plymouth."

"Come on board, sir."

"Aye, aye, sir!"

Captain Dolan had had practice in this kind of thing, and having a certificate from the Trinity House that had belonged to a Captain Thompson, and the regular papers of a cutter, Sarah, of Plymouth, in readiness, he quickly got into the cutter's boat, and Martin and Ben Bowline—on both of whom he knew he could depend, as regarded the discretion of their acts—pulled him over the short distance toward the schooner.

"Now, Martin," said Dolan, as they neared the schooner, "don't do things too shipshape!"

"All right," said Martin, as he purposely slipped his oar from the rowlocks and put the boat out of its course.

"Oh, you lubbers!" cried Mr. Royle. "I only wish I had you on board a king's ship for a spell. There, that will do. Don't run us down. Well, sir, who are you?"

Dolan stepped on to the deck of the schooner and touched his cap respectfully.

"Any order sir?"

"Well, I don't know as to that. Have you your papers?"

"Yes, sir."

"Hem! Ah, hem! Captain Barnabus Thompson, of the port of Plymouth. I suppose it's all right—hem! Ah! the Sarah?"

"Yes, sir.

"Well. Have you seen a cutter—about your size—mast raking out of all custom, with a yellow streak beneath her bulwarks—and a very large foresail that she oughtn't to have at all; in fact, she is rigged anyhow but sails as if the old 'un himself puffed her along?"

"Yes, sir."

"Oh! you have?"

"Yes, sir. Snch a cutter tried to overhaul us, but we got out of her way, or else she gave it up and went off due west about an hour ago."

"Due west! We ought to see her."

"So you ought, sir; and there is a sail right hull down that looks like a gull's wing on the water that I should say was the very cutter."

"It may be. Thank you."

"You are welcome, sir. Can I be of any use—I am going into Falmouth?"

"No—yet stay a moment—you can report to Sir Thomas Clifford, the port admiral—that the Spray is off and on, looking out for the Rift, and hopes to bring her in soon."

"Yes, sir; I hope you may."

"Good-day, Mr. Thompson."

"Good-day, sir."

As cool and calm and collected as it was possible for any human being to be, Dolan got over the side of the schooner and into his boat, and Martin and Bowline pushed off and dipped their oars into the water with long, vigorous strokes. It was at this moment that Mr. Green strolled up from the state-cabin—where the Honorable Charles Minto Grey was, as usual, enjoying his meerschaum—and going to the side next the Rift, he said:

"What is all this about, Mr. Royle?"

"Only been trying to get some information from a stupid captain of a cutter yonder. The Sarah."

"The what?"

"The Sarah,"

"But she is not the Sarah."

"Oh, yes, sir. I saw her papers and her name is on her stern. You will see, sir."

"Well, it looks to me like 'Rocket, South Shields.'"

Mr. Royle took up his glass and looked, when to his eyes a very curious phenomenon, in regard to the name of the cutter, presented itself. There was a strip of something—wood or leather, he could not make out which—or it might be canvas, flapping about just under the carved woodwork at the stern of the cutter; and as this something flapped in one direction, there was on one side of it the name "Sarah, Plymouth," and on the other, "Rocket, South Shields."

"What do you make of it?" said Mr. Green.

"I don't like it at all."

"It's odd!"

"Very. Holloa!"

"What now, Mr. Royle?"

"Some one is fluttering a handkerchief from her cabin window. Why, good gracious!"

"What now?"

"She is altering the rake of her mast, it seems to me, and setting more canvas. Unless I am a Dutchman, I should say that I can just see the corner of the muzzle of a gun on her deck half hidden by some matting and a tarpaulin. I don't like the Sarah, of Plymouth."

"Nor I! What if, after all, she should turn out to be the Rift?"

"By the Holy, sir, it may be! Cutter, ahoy! Hilloa! Cutter, ahoy! Hilloa! Come back, sir—you Captain Thompson—we want to speak to you."

Dolan had got more than two-thirds of the way to the cutter when this new hail came upon his ears, and he glanced back at the Spray as if irresolute in regard to what he should do. Both Martin and Ben Bowline saw that look of Dolan's and the latter said at once:

"No—no. It won't do. There is something amiss."

"Surely not."

Martin ceased rowing for an instant and gazed earnestly at the schooner. Then he said quietly:

"Give way, Ben—give way. We are in for it now. Give way, or all is lost!"

A shrill whistle from the deck of the government schooner came over the surface of the sea and then there was a splash in the water as her boat was afloat and half a dozen of her crew sprang into it.

"Now, Ben," cried Martin—"pull with a will!"

The oars splashed in the water, and in a few seconds Dolan and Ben Bowline and Martin were on the deck of the Rift and the boat properly secured. The little vessel had been slowly beating about the spot, taking tacks of some quarter of a mile each, and not the slightest delay need take place in her showing her heels to the schooner. There was not much anxiety on the mind of Dolan, for well he knew that there was no schooner, cutter or other vessel afloat in the Channel that in a stern chase would have the slightest chance of competing with the Rift.

The Spray was quite far enough off to give his vessel all the start she wanted, and he knew that in the first five miles he should be able to show the government schooner how futile a pursuit would be.

"Now work on?" he cried. "Show them a bit of our quality—for I don't like the looks of things on the deck of the Spray at all."

The boat that had been launched from the schooner had not got above a dozen of its own lengths from the Spray when she was recalled and the men rested with a dissatisfied look on their oars—for English sailors have a notion that they can board and take anything that swims; and it is by no means a very extravagant one, considering what has been done in that way under a Nelson and a Cochrane.

"Look out!" shouted Martin. "Down with the helm! That will do. Here she comes!"

A gun had been hastily prepared on board of the Spray; and even as Martin spoke, the report followed the flash, and there was a sharp whistle of the shot passing close to the weather-bow of the Rift.

"Very good," said Martin. "The fellow now knows what he is about. That will do, I think."

This last observation of Martin's arose from his observation of a very peculiar shaped sail, which had been—on the moment that speed became a prominent object in the proceedings of the Rift—bent to her cordage and mast. It was probably such a sail as cutter never carried before; but it had—or rather the secret of its shape and use—been bequeathed to Dolan by an old buccaneer who had seen it used in the South Seas, and found how wonderfully effective it was, just on a wind.

The cutter made one dipping sort of motion, as though it had an intention, like a duck in diving, of gathering the sea over its decks, and then it flew, rather than sailed, on its course, north by west.

All further disguise was now useless, so far as the fact of the cutter finding it inconvenient to be overhauled by the government vessel—although those on board the schooner could, after all, only have a suspicion that it was the Rift they had in chase.

Mr. Royle looked fearfully savage at the recollection that he had actually had the captain of the cutter in his hands and had let him go again. With compressed lips and uttering low, growling expletives, such as are not usually-addressed to polite ears—he watched the Rift as it sped its way over the sea.

But if a stern chase be a long chase; for it is one, likewise, that keeps the game long in view. The cutter might sail five feet to the schooner's three, but that only took it at the rate of two feet from the schooner at the given period of time; and now the Spray was crowded with all the canvas that could be put upon her, until she was in such a situation that had she been in a more treacherous sea than the English Channel, where sudden squalls, typhoons or cyclones might abound, but little chance of safety would have been left her. As it was, she made good speed.

"It won't do, Mr. Green," said Royle; "it won't do. She'll get away."

"Cripple her. It is the only chance."

"We will try it. Double charge the long carronade, you lubbers, and ram well home! We will hit her or burst, I take it! Clear away there! Now let me get to it!"

Mr. Royle flung himself at length by the breach of the gun and carefully sighted the chase. As the Rift rose and fell on the seas she was cutting her way through, he watched until the rise and fall of the Spray was coincident with that of the cutter; and then, rolling over from the position he had assumed in sighting the gun, he cried:

"Fire!"

Bang! went the doubly charged carronade; and a circle of light blue smoke flew upward, hanging fantastically about the sails of the vessel. A gust of the rather fitful breeze that had got up within the last half hour cleared the vapor from before the gun; and then Mr. Royle uttered a loud cheer of exultation.

"Hit—hit!" he cried. "She's hit! Ready, my lads, to give it him again!"

Mr. Green looked earnestly at the Rift through a glass, and that there was confusion on her deck was sufficiently evident—for there lay a heap of white canvas and she visibly altered her course a point or two to the north.

The fact was that the shot from the Spray had done the only mischief the Rift had to dread, and that was to bring down some of her gear. For the time the new and extraordinary sail that had given such speed to the smuggling vessel had been rendered useless, it having been brought down by the gun, and that was the white object that Mr. Green saw encumbering her deck.

The speed of the Rift was materially checked and all was hope and excitement on board the Spray, that the cutter might, in fact, be the very vessel they were commissioned to destroy or capture, and that they were in a fair way of being alongside of her in the course of half an hour.

"Now, again!" shouted Mr. Royle.

And the carronade was once more pointed and fired. But this time the luck was on the side of the Rift, for the all flew harmlessly past her—certainly in rather too close proximity to the man at the wheel to be pleasant to him, but as Martin remarked, "A miss is as good as a mile, so that's all right."

But the damage was really very serious on board the Rift, and Ben Bowline looked Captain Dolan in the face as he said, in his usual unamiable manner, as regards the quality of his voice:

"It's not much use now. The new jiggamaree of a sail is done for, and though we can beat him in plain sailing, he will sight right in to shore."

"Captain Dolan took a long look about him and then, in a suppressed voice, he said:

"One hour more daylight."

"That's all, sir."

"Keep on, then, with all speed for a few miles further. How is she as to trim—eh?"

A glance at the rake of the mast let Dolan know that he might with effect shift some of his dead weight forward, and that was accordingly done, so that the cutter was soon placed in her best position for sailing, and there, after casting a long and anxious look at the Spray, which seemed, if anything to have neared them by a trifle, Captain Dolan shouted in a loud voice:

"Aft, here, men of the Rift—aft here, I say!"

That this portended some important communication to them the men well knew, and they gathered slowly about the main hatchway.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The True Home.

The home should be as beautiful and pleasant as it is possible to make it. Home is the place for rest and pure enjoyment. It is the refuge from care, trouble, and all the tumults and turmoils of life. It is the one spot where the heart's purest affections garner themselves, and seek their chosen resting-place. It is the woman's first duty to make this dwelling-place, over which she is the mother-queen, as cheery, cozy, and lovely as she can. The first requisite for this desired consummation is that she herself be happy, hopeful, pleasant, and contentedly agreeable. To become this she must live hygienically, she must eat proper food, wear comfortable clothes, and not be oppressed by too many cares and burdens. If she is her own housekeeper, she should study to do her work on the most simple and easy plan, cook but a few dishes at a time, and have each as perfect in itself as possible.

Woman has no more important duty than that of making home pleasant. Neatness and cleanliness are indispensable to a cheery, cozy-looking room. A plain room, plainly furnished and scrupulously clean, is far more bright and beautiful than a more pretentious one richly adorned with costly furniture that is soiled, mutilated, and always in disorder. A few thrifty, nicely kept flowering plants and trailing vines are one of the most enlivening adjuncts to a living-room, and a sheltered, sunny window is far better for them, in moderately cool weather, than the over-heated and often dusty inside position, and they are just as easily seen also.

Should there be unsightly objects in the room or recesses that contain necessary adjuncts to comfort and convenience, a bright chintz curtain will screen them from view, and will of itself make a pleasant resting-place for the eye. Should a bit of plastering fall from the wall, a piece of white muslin neatly pasted over the place will hide the defect and save all further scaling off and droppings of litter. In a thousand ways one can veil the ugly and add to the beautiful, until the humblest little home may become a very bower of pleasantness and cheerfulness.

The love of the beautiful needs the fostering care of every one who would make life pleasant and happy. Whoever creates a a lovely picture, whether on canvas, in a poem, or on the broad brown bosom of mother earth, or in a cozy, cheerful home, adds to the world's priceless treasure, and does something toward elevating, refining, and happifying the race.

FALL FUN.

Sound conclusion—A dying echo.

Carpenters generally talk plane.

A hotel is known by the company it keeps.

A woman's beauty is most perfect when it is backed by intelligence. A newspaper bustle is just the thing.

When an old maid gets married the groom should ring the chestnut bell. There's no joke in marrying an old maid.

A coal-stove is a cast-iron paradox. It won't burn unless you put it up, and then it won't burn unless you shake it down.

When the husband slips in a front window and the other fellow slips out a rear window, which is the most proficient slipper?

Hotel Proprietor—"We don't allow any games of chance here." Gambler—"This isn't a game of chance. My friend here has no chance."

"My daughter," exclaimed a fashionable mother, "is innocence itself. You can't say anything in her presence that will make her blush."

According to Professor Procter, "the sun is 1,200,000 times as large as the earth." They must have an awful time hunting for the north pole up there.

The Phrenological Journal says: "In choosing a wife, be governed by her chin." A man is apt to be governed by the same thing after he gets a wife.

Even pious souls are sometimes tempted to lapse into the wanton spirit of the little maiden who prayed: "Please, Mr. God, I'm tired o' bein' made good—won't you kill pa?"

Wife—"What do you suppose is the reason there are no marriages in heaven?" Husband—"You stupid goose! It is to offset the fact that there is no heaven in marriage."

It was pretty nearly half-past eleven o'clock when he began to sing "How can I leave Thee?" to his best girl. Pretty soon her papa came down stairs and he found out how easy it was.

"So the missus is to be married, eh?" said the gardener to the cook. "Yis; and in illigant stoyle, too. She's goin' for to have a dhress thray yarruds long, and four pall-bearers to kerry it."

When the Shower Had Passed By.

Pat was one day lately going along a street, when it came on a very heavy shower of rain. To keep his coat dry he entered the doorway of a stationer's shop, but was immediately pulled up by the shopkeeper asking: "What's your business there, my man?"

Pat—"Och, thin, I wasn't wishing to disturb yis, but now that I've got yer attintion, I was wanting a song called the 'Ould Arm Chair.'"

Shopkeeper—"Oh, yes; here it is."

Pat—"Thin I would like 'Annie Laurie.'"

Shopkeeper—"Just at hand here, sir."

Pat—"Thin 'The Last Rose of Summer,' and that will do."

The shower having abated, Pat was making for the door, when he was reminded that he had left his songs and that the charge was three shillings.

Pat—"Och, thin, just put the ould arm chair in that corner, clap Annie Laurie in it, and stick the last rose of summer in her breast; and if the crayther should weary, give her that good auld song, 'Jilted by a Paddy,' to amuse her."

MARKDALE, NOV. 4. 1886,

SPOT CASH.

The Editor of the Flesherton Advance proposes adopting the strictly cash in advance system in regard tc news paper subscriptions, similar to city papers.

If this could be successfully enforced, one of the greatest hardships and annoyances of the country publisher would be removed.

A newspaper subscription is so trifling in itself, and when scattered generally over the area of twenty miles in diameter, besides occasional ones all over the continent, it can easily be seen how difficult it becomes to make satisfactory collections.

There are always those who pay prompt, and generally this class is in the majority, yet, even twenty five per cent are delinquent, while the half of that number are doubtful as to ever paying, it makes the list at once unsatisfactory

We can see no valid reason however why the strict cash system cannot be introduced and enforced. Our prompt paying subscribers would require to assist in the undertaking, (what we mean by prompt paying subscribers are those who renew say within a month of the date when their sub. expired, as well as those renewing generally before it had expired) because if such a course was decided on by the publisher, all names whether first class or doubtful would be struck off the list at a given time, say two weeks after the subscription had expired if not renewed. This would doubtless have the effect of decreasing the list of subscribers, at least for a time, but we are inclined to think the loss would not equal the gain, first, from supplying papers from year to year to many who do not pay, and also of securing the amount in all cases in advance from those who pay when in arrears.

For our own part we have not fully decided our future course, but in case we adopt the "Cash in Advance" system for the year 1887, we will give due notice so that all can govern themselves accordingly; in the mean time we would like to hear from our patrons as well as our exchanges on the matter.

The Late Convention.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

Dear Sir,—Through your coulmns I wish to make following enquiry, namely, how out of 75 delegates legally entitled to vote at the Conservative Convention held at Markdale on the 11th inst., could 112 votes be polled?

The number of delegates entitled to vote is as follows:—

Artemesia	12
Collingwood	17
Euphrasia	21
Holland	15
Sullivan	5
Osprey	nil
Township Presidents	4
Officers of the association entitled to vote for candidates for the Local, three of them voting, namely, Secretary, Treasurer and Corresponding Secretary	3
Total	75

Now, Sir, The above figures shows the number of legal votes present at the above convention and how was the balance procured,? I think it was by special invitation to pack the convention in favor of Mr. Borke and against myself. However I hope some of the offisers will explain how this very large vote was polled from the municipalities above set forth, leaving a surplus of 37 to be placed. Whom shall I give credit for the manipulation? Such work will not be tolerated by the true Conservatives of East Grey.

By giving the above space in your columns you will oblige,

Yours truly.

NEIL MCCOLMAN, M. P. P.

Thornbury, Oct. 25th, 1886.

A RADICAL CHANGE.— Daniel Sullivan, of Malcom, Ont., takes pleasure in recommending Burdock Blood Bitters for dyspepsia. It cured him after years of suffering. From being a sceptic he is now a confirmed believer in that medicine.

McColman Kicking.

EDITOR STANDARD.—I notice a letter in the Owen Sound Times over the signature, of Neil McColman finding fault with the personal of the late Conservative Convention for East Grey. He is the last man who should say anything about the manipulation of conventions.

He squeals now because he was not so successful in that line as he was two years ago.

Figures they say won't lie, but McColman tries to make them do some queer work; for instance, he says Artemesia only sent 12 de.egates; now I have it upon undoubted authority that there were 20 properly qualified delegates from that township, and when so far estray in one township, why not in all? Again, I would just ask him one question; when the first ballot was taken showing 110 ballots cast, why did he not then take exception to the vote? He is too old a politican not to have known how many delegates were at the convention before the balloting took place, and I may just say here that I have attended, during my residence in the county for the last 25 years, every conservative convention held, and am free to affirm that a fairer or more representative convention I never attended, or one which was so free from wirepulling or secret caucusing; every delegate appeared to have his mind made up to get the very best man possible as their representative.

The conservatives of this riding have never been better satisfied with the choice of a convention than on this occasion. and no convention. that could be called, of at all if a representative character, would reverse the vote given for Mr. Rorke.

Both before and after the balloting Mr. McColman plebged himself to abide by the decision of the conventiou without a word of objection to representatives constituting the convention. His selfish attemp now to create disturbance and division cannot possibly result in any gain to himself either of influence or popularity, and will, if persisted in, only serve to prove to the conservatives of East Grey how ungrateful a man his type can be.

The party connot now be divided to any extent on the choice of Mr. Rorke; he is a gentleman whose character is without reproach whose ability for the conduct of public business has been proved by years of experience in the County Council where important trusts have been confided to him: He is a representative that any constituency might be proud of. His acquaintance with puplic affairs, general intelligence, culture and gentlemanly bearing will soon place him in parliament, as a man adding strength to his party, and having weight and influence when the interests of his constituents can be served.

Yours truly

A Conservative Delegate.

The Elections Not at Hand.

OTTAWA, Nov. 1.—The Citizen this morning, under the heading of "No General Elections," says editorially: "The Cabinet had a long sitting on Saturday, from 2 p. m. to 6:30. We have the highest authority for stating that the question of a general election has not been discussed by the Cabinet, much less any decision arrived at."

[Mr. A. R. McIntyre, who came up from Ottawa yesterday, said he did not expect the elections this year. Sir John he said, it was understood at Ottawa, would leave for England about Nov. 16.]

Only a Game of Euchre!

BY ARCHIE MACK.

Only a game of euchre!
Only one little game!
But the fatal cup is tasted,
And drained to the dregs again.

Only a game of euchre!
Only a loved son's fall!
Only a weak one tempted,
Tempted to sin, that's all!

Only a game of euchre!
Veiled is the tempter's snare—
Hidden the deathly danger—
Ye tempted ones, beware!

Only a game of euchre;
Sullied a once fair name—
A shattered, ruined household,
That withers 'neath the shame.

Only a game of euchre
To pass the time away!
The downward course is taken,
The evil course of "play."

Only a game of euchre!
Only the wine-cup's slave!
Only a ruined lifetime!
Only a gambler's grave!

Kathleen's Repentance.

Four people sat in the large drawing-room at Castle Dermott, an old half-ruined mansion in the North of Ireland; old Colonel Macdermott, owner of the castle and its few impoverished acres; his lovely daughter Kathleen, the belle of the county, with the bright blue eyes and brilliantly fair complexion so often seen in Irishwomen; his quiet little brown-eyed niece Margaret; and Ronald Hargrove, the son of an old friend.

The old gentleman was busy with an antiquated newspaper, Roland and Kathleen were whispering earnestly together, and Margaret had discreetly withdrawn herself to the far end of the long room, rightly guessing that she was not wanted by the other two.

And certainly any third party would have been a grievous hindrance to their conversation, for Roland's looks were fixed most wistfully upon Kathleen's lovely face and downcast eyes, while he pleaded with her for her love, his own being entirely hers.

"Do not turn away from me, beautiful Kathleen; I have loved you from the first moment I saw you, and your love would be an inestimable treasure to me. I am poor now—would for your sweet sake it were otherwise; it seems so cruel to ask you, so peerlessly lovely, so fitted by Nature to fill the loftiest position, to share any but princely fortunes. But I shall not always be poor, I feel within me the capabilities of future success; the splendid prospects opening before me, through Lord Carwardine's generous offer of this secretaryship, bid fair to lead me to fame and fortune, and if I could only have the sweet knowledge that you love me and are waiting for me, oh, Kathleen! there is nothing I could not do, no task so arduous I would not undertake it, spurred on by such hopes."

Roland's face glowed with enthusiasm, but Kathleen was still silent. He mistook this for maiden shyness, and continued to plead for her promise.

Presently, raising her lovely eyes to his face, she said:

"I really don't know what to say, Roland. You have taken me by surprise, and I—I have no wish to be married nor even engaged for a long time. Will you give me a few weeks to think about it?"

A few weeks! To a man desperately in love this was intolerable, and Roland felt a sudden chill. If Kathleen loved him, why not tell him so at once? But he conquered his patience, and promised to wait for her answer until the night before his departure from Castle Dermott for London, which would be in about ten days. Could he have seen beneath Kathleen's winning position he would never have loved her, but he took her outward beauty and grace as a sign that she must be true-hearted and loving, and had given her all the devotion of his noble chivalrous nature.

"I am in a horrid quandary," thought Kathleen to herself, lying awake restless and excited long after she had retired to rest; "I am twenty-two now, and have sent away no end of lovers since I was seventeen, because not one has ever been able to give me the position I want in the world of rank and fashion from which I am shut out here. If I only could know whether Lord Carwardine really feels anything beyond passing admiration for me, I should know how to act."

Lord Carwardine was the great county magnate, fabulously rich, a great Parliamentary leader, forty years of age, but handsome and unmarried. His influence had procured Roland the lucrative secretary's post he was soon to fill, and the secret of Kathleen's hesitation was that one or two dinners and balls they had all attended at his mansion during his short Christmas visit, he had been very attentive to her—not enough to cause remark, but quite sufficient to raise ambitious hopes and wishes in her breast.

There was to be a large ball held in the county hall the following week, in aid of the Irish Distress Fund. Lord Carwardine would be present, and Kathleen thought:

"I shall see then whether he thinks anything seriously or not; if he does I shall still be free, and if not, then I may as well accept Roland. I dare say he will succeed as he says, though it will be horrid to wait for years. I should be quite old before he could give me half so good a position as would be mine at once if Lord Carwardine would only propose. It is terribly perplexing, but then I might be worse off, like poor Maggie even, who never had a sweetheart in her life, and never will."

And the proud beauty composed herself to sleep, while poor Maggie, who was quite a little Cinderella to her grand cousin, minus the cinders and housework, also tossed on her pillow sleeplessly.

But that pillow was wet with tears of bitter unrequited love—a first pure love, all given to Roland Hargrove, but entirely unsuspected by him, or any one else.

He had been kind and attentive to her, out of pity first, because no one else seemed to take any notice of her, and because she was an orphan like himself, but from interest lately, because he found her so bright and intelligent, and so ready to listen while he talked of his hopes and plans for the future, to which Kathleen always listened impatiently, or interrupted him to ask some question about the great people he knew in London.

Her father would gladly have given her a season in town, but he was too poor to afford it, and their only fashionable relative, Lady Burnett, had three plain daughters of her own to get established, and took care never to invite so dangerous a rival as their lovely cousin; so Kathleen was obliged to crush all her ambitious longings to be the leader of a brilliant circle, unless marriage brought her the longed for opportunity.

The night of the ball arrived; Kathleen was looking surpassingly lovely, in a new costume that would cost the poor dressmaker many a sleepless night to pay for. Roland escorted her, but once at the ball she took care to keep away from him as much as possible, in terror lest Lord Carwardine might suspect anything of an engagement between them.

She was delighted to see his lordship's face brighten as he first saw her, also to have her card taken, and his name written against several dances.

As the evening wore on a gratified flush heightened her beauty, Lord Carwardine seemed to take so much pleasure in her society, surely her hopes were about to be crowned with success.

Only once when she saw Roland and him in close converse she felt a little uneasy, but then she reflected Roland could not in honor say anything likely to spoil her chances, for he had not the slightest claim on her.

"Kathleen, I am so sorry to shorten your pleasure, but there is important state business to be attended to, and I have promised Lord Carwardine to catch the night mail. Will you mind me taking you home now?" asked Roland immediately after supper.

"Oh, I could not possibly leave yet. Just look at my card," answered Kathleen hastily. "Don't let me keep you, Roland; go by all means. Lady Mount Heriot will chaperon me, I know, and I could not go just now."

"But, Kathleen, I may not see you again for some time, and I want my answer. Come in here for a moment," and he drew her gently into a small conservatory unoccupied just then. "I shall leave you if you wish it, of course, but I am very much disappointed to lose the lovely star-lit drive I had promised myself with you. However, hope and bliss will go with me if you will only give me your promise."

"I cannot, indeed I cannot, Mr. Hargrove," interrupted Kathleen in great agitation, dreading lest Lord Carwardine, whose name was on her card for the next dance, should appear and interrupt their tete-a-tete. Pray do not ask me again. I—I—do not love you—I can never marry you!"

Shocked and startled by the decision of her tone, which was unmistakable, Roland released her hand and said in a voice hoarse with grief and disappointment:

"Miss Macdermott, I cannot sue twice; is this your final answer?"

For one instant Kathleen hesitated. What if, after all, Lord Carwardine's attentions were only friendly. But no, she could not bear the thought, she must win this prize.

"I am sorry it is the only answer I can give you. I hope you will be happy and——"

"Hush, hush, Kathleen; such words from you are a mockery. Good-bye; may you never know a like grief to that you have caused me."

And hastily wringing her hand, Roland left her standing there, forgetting in his desperate grief the common politeness which would have caused him to take her back to the ballroom.

But Kathleen willingly forgave his want of gallantry in the relief she felt at his departure, and ten minutes hence she was waltzing with Lord Corwardine, gay and sparkling as ever, without a single regretful thought for the man who had just gone from her presence, crushed and broken-hearted.

Meanwhile, Roland had hastened home, and packing a small portmanteau, wrote a hurried note to the colonel, who had long since retired, and was leaving the house when he noticed a light in the little room off the library where Maggie and Kathleen often sat.

He looked in, the former, still keeping up the role of Cinderella, was waiting up for her gay cousin.

She started and pushed away the book she had been reading, blushing crimson at Roland's sudden appearance.

"What, Maggie, not gone to rest yet. Well, I have someone to say good-bye to me then. I am off to London."

"How sudden! And how ill you look, Mr. Hargrove. Where is Kathleen? I did not hear you come home."

"Your cousin is still in fairy-land; you had better not wait for her, she will not be home yet. Oh, Maggie, little Maggie, I have had a cruel blow since I left this house a few hours ago."

And then, though he had not intended it, he told her all, and Maggie, sweet unselfish girl, sympathised with and consoled him, and spoke such glowing words of hope for the future, and of high aims in life, that Roland Hargrove felt able to rise superior to his grief.

"God bless you, Maggie," he said fervently as he left her. "If ever I win name, or fame, or fortune, I shall owe it to you. I shall feel I have one true friend while you live."

Some hours afterwards, the proud ambitious beauty arrived at home mad with rage and shame. Lord Corwardine had spoken of Roland with highest commendation; and believing, as did most in their circle that they were engaged, had commenced to congratulate her on his success, when Kathleen hastily disclaimed any but feelings of friendship towards him.

"I am truly sorry for poor Mr. Hargrove, then; I feel certain he loves you, and I hope yet to see you change your mind," said Lord Carwardine.

Down went the fairy palace Kathleen had built, and a little later the ruin was complete, for one of her partners, delighted to spread what was not yet public, informed her that Lord Carwardine was to marry the Duke of St. Maurice's eldest daughter next autumn.

"You will see the lion of the season to-night, Kathleen. Ah, by the way, I think you told me he was an old flame of yours. Take my advice, and try to fan it into life again. He is not married yet, or was not at the close of the season; he has been abroad mostly since."

So spoke Lady Burnett, who having successfully married her own girls, was trying to secure a husband for Kathleen, now in her twenty-seventh year.

For five years the haughty girl had been wearing away youth and beauty in their old ruined Irish mansion; no attempt to recall Roland had been successful. Maggie, tired at last of submitting to her capricious temper, had left her and taken a situation as companion to an old lady of rank and fashion who soon learned to appreciate her at her true value.

Lord Carwardine had married the duke's daughter, and Kathleen's life had been utterly uneventful since.

That night Lady Burnett's fashionable house was thronged with distinguished visitors, but Kathleen cared for none; she was waiting with feverish anxiety for her old discarded lover, now Sir Roland Hargrove, the rising young politician whose wonderful talent for diplomacy had been the means of keeping his party in office, and had won for him already a baronetcy, besides the esteem and confidence of his leaders.

He came at last, and Kathleen, as in a dream, saw him again; but oh, what is this? A lady, shining in silks and costly jewels, is with him, and Lady Burnett, disappointed, but courtly and gracious as ever, is introducing them.

"Sir Roland and Lady Hargrove!"

Kathleen looked up, and Lady Hargrove took her hand, exclaiming:

"Kathleen dear, I am so pleased to see you again!"

"Maggie!" was Kathleen's exclamation.

"Yes, Miss Macdermott, your cousin Maggie, now my dear and cherished wife. You see we were all abroad together, and have stolen a march upon society generally, not wishing to make a show of oursevles. You will forgive and not refuse to acknowledge us?" he added with the old winning smile Kathleen remembered so well.

She made some commonplace reply, and turned to listen to Maggie's animated conversation, sick at heart.

All through that London season she had to see Maggie occupying the position as leader of fashion which she had so coveted, and once, to increase the bitter repentence, she overheard Maggie say to her husband, when some thoughtful act of his had pleased her,

"You are too good to me, dear Roland."

"Nay, my darling, you are wrong. How can I ever be good enough to the darling little wife, whose faithful love was my comfort and hope through years of trial and adversity?"

Decide And Do.

Scarcely anything is more productive of uneasiness, vexations and disappointments than the determination to leave that until to-morrow which may be as well performed to-day; and to no one are the consequences more serious in the end than to the thoughtless individual who contracted this unfortunate habit. Procrastination—it is not only the thief of time; it often happens that the procrastinator loses fame, fortune, respect, and confidence from others in this world.

Great things spring from trifles, and the habits once formed in the young mind are difficult—nay, we would almost say, impossible to be wholly eradicated. "It can be done as well to-morrow as to-day," has been applied often, perhaps to matters of inconsiderable or trifling importance. Days, and months, and years roll on, and the mind gradually becomes a slave to a tyranny so fearful, that if sober reflection were called to the aid of the men or women who are continually exclaiming, "I'll see about it," they would shrink from the act of delaying. Some do, and happy are they whose strength of mind enables them to draw back in time; but by far the greater portion only think seriously on the error—of which they cannot but be conscious—for a moment or two, and then dispel unwelcome ideas for a time which with a determination to return to the investigation at a more convenient season, which either never arrives or only comes when it is too late to repair the evil or prevent the consequences. Some reproach themselves with having long neglected to visit, it may be, a dear or an afflicted friend, "I am quite ashamed," say they, "of not having visited such and such a one before this, but I will go to-morrow."

The morrow comes, and they do not go; day after day elapses, till by some sudden impulse or emergency, they do that which might long since have been done, but they find in their former warm acquaintance distant looks and a frigid civility, and for the beaming eye and kindly tone of the once animated and cheerful friend, their gaze rests on the inanimate form, the closed orbs, and the marble lips. Then, for a time, remorse does its work; neglected opportunities rise up in judgment to condemn; and the torture of crushed hopes attends them. For a season, it may be, they struggle with their tyrant, but the habit has gained strength by its repeated exercise, and it soon reascends the throne which it had but temporarily abdicated, and commences once more, and with renewed energies, its resistless domination.

There is no circle of society, either political, social, literary, or commercial, where the baneful effects of this habit are not observable. The "law's delay" is not so fatal to the happiness of mankind, as a whole, as is the delay which springs from our own inclination, and choice.

Those who act promptly only feel the pleasure of knowing that certain things have been done at the right time, and that it is over. Unpleasantries lose half their repelling aspects by boldly facing them. In all cases unnecessary delays are dangerous; in no case are they excusable. To all, then, we say, "Decide and do."

Where Inexperience is Valuable.

"Hello, Joggins, what are you doing now?" asked Snooper.

"I am running a hotel."

"How do you like it?"

"Pretty well; but there's something very peculiar about the business."

"What is it?"

"You know that in any other business the more a man knows about it the more chance he has to succeed."

"Well, is it not so in the hotel business?"

"Oh, no; in that line the inn-experienced man succeeds best."

Captain Feron, of the 91st Battalion of Manitoba, has raised a company of Icelanders, Norwegians, and Swedes, and they are alleged to present a fine appearance.

A citizen of Kingston has decided to take action for $20,000 against a prominent resident of Storrington Township for circulating the report that the Kingstonian is almost always under the influence of liquor.

The Port Arthur Sentinel states that the East End mine at Silver Mountain has been sold to a company of English capitalists; that $200,000 has been appropriated for the development of the property, and that active operations will be commenced at once.

A man at Spring Hill, N. S., was fined $5 and costs for putting out poison in his garden, which destroyed a number of his neighbor's hens. He was earning $1 a day, but rather than pay the amount of the fine and costs, about $7, he served out a twenty days' term in gaol.

A boy named George Edminson, of Ashfield, arose before the rest of the family one morning recently, and while washing was seized with a fit and fell into a water trough and was drowned. A few years ago his grandfather, while in a fit, fell into a ditch and was drowned. Both were subject to fits.

Last week a landslide occurred in the Rocky Mountains, near Ashcroft, on the Canadian Pacific line, while a passenger train was passing over it. Air brakes were applied and the train stopped in time to prevent a serious accident. The engine left the road and the engineer was scalded. Fifty feet of road went away.

The Scrip Commission have closed their work at Prince Albert and have gone to Batoche. Fifty-five Halfbreeds left the treaty in the Prince Albert district and took scrip, and scrip was issued to fifty-four non-treaty Halfbreeds. Only four took land scrip. The total amount of scrip issued at Prince Albert was about $26,000.

A St. Thomas hide dealer had been in the habit of purchasing hides and sheepskins from one of his employees. On Wednesday afternoon he purchased a hide from the employee which it seemed to him he had purchased from a farmer in the forenoon. The employee was questioned, admitted the offence, and on making restitution was relieved from legal proceedings.

Farmers in Clarendon, N. B., set a trap for a bear that had been slaughtering their young stock. A fence was built around the trap, so that when the bear got over he must put his foot in it. Bruin was as smart as any fox. He didn't get over the fence, but dug under it, overturned the trap, and got the bait. The farmers tried again, this time setting a second trap in the hole that the bear had dug. This was too much for him, and in the morning he was found, raging, but firmly held by the jaws of the trap that he had not seen.

Ira Cuthbert, a weak-minded boy, 15 or 16 years of age, son of Wm. Cuthbert, who resides near Sweaburg, drove his brother William to Woodstock a few days ago. Not having returned home, inquiry was at once instituted, and it was found that he was last seen going over Cedar Creek bridge on his homeward way. He was driving a black horse with white face. About twenty of the neighbors turned out the next morning to make a search, but so far the search has been unavailing.

The Calgary Fair is stated to have been successful beyond the most sanguine expectations of its promoters. The show building was crowded with exhibits of farm produce; wheat, oats, peas, and barley being largely represented. The dairy display was of unusual excellence. The exhibit of live stock is not often excelled in any part of Canada, and the display of grain and roots was such as to prove the exceptional capacity of the Red Deer district for the growing of these crops.

A short time ago a yoke of cattle were stolen from Mr. Arthur Simpson, of the 13th concession of Bentick, and two young men, James Brennan, of Holland, and John Buchanan, of Sullivan, were arrested near Harriston for the theft. The cattle were tired, and the young men were resting on a fence corner when overtaken by the constables. They were taren to Durham and committed for trial. The young men are not professional thieves, and were both drunk when they stole the oxen.

Mrs. Dunlop, arrested for the murder of her husband at Mink Lake, since the time of the tragedy has resided with her father a few miles distant from her late husband's home. Here Constable Hollingsworth found her, and on his making known his errand no one in the house uttered a word. Finally, Mrs. Dunlop asked the constable if she would have to go with him then or if she could remain until the next day, and when told that she would have to accompany the constable at once she retired to her room to dress for the journey without further comment.

There is a woman at Chatham, N.B., who cherishes a great dislike to the Salvation Army. A few days ago, as the army was passing her house, she gave vent to her spite by bouncing in and closing the door with a bang. But she could not open it again. Her children came home and, after a period of kicking and pushing, were forced to climb in through the window. Her husband returned from work, and after a vain effort to open the door crawled through the window also. The door had to be wrenched off the hinges finally and set up again before it could be induced to resume operations.

Sorrowing for the Dead in Africa.

The beating of the drum announced [illegible] the dance was about to begin. The men [illegible] ranged themselves vis-a-vis with the women [illegible] as in a ballet dance in a European theatre. The dance opened by an advance of the women [illegible] man, who kneeled before the womenand then [illegible] retired. The men next advanced, slapping [illegible] each other on the thigh, knelt, and with [illegible] drew. After a pause both men and women [illegible] went through a figure somewhat resembling [illegible] "The Lancers." The women displayed [illegible] peculiar contortions of the limbs, and [illegible] taneously the men passed in and out between [illegible] the contortionists. This was only a prelude [illegible] lude to a more exciting scene—a very lively [illegible] dance not unlike the French can-can [illegible] companied by savage gesticulations [illegible] of the men threw themselves violently [illegible] the ground; others crawled about "on all [illegible] fours," whilst the women sat down clapping [illegible] their knees with their hands. Subsequently [illegible] the women formed a circle, and then rose [illegible] ed into line joined by the men. The dancers vied with each other in grotesque contortions, and the one who succeeded the best was the loudest applauded. Every joint and muscle was brought into play, and at intervals the men and women would rush out to refresh themselves with millet beer. In this way the "sorrow for the dead" was kept up throughout the night without intermission.

Driving Boys From Home.

Mothers who are disturbed by the noise and untidiness of the boys at home, must be careful, lest by reproaches they drive their children from home in search of pleasure elsewhere. "There are those banisters all finger marks again," said Mrs. Cur[illegible] as she made haste with a soft linen cloth to polish down the shining oak again. "George," she said as she gave a decided wrench at the top of the basin of suds, "if you go up those stairs again before bed-time you shall be punished."

"I should like to know where I can go," said George, "I cannot stay in the kitchen I am so much in the way, and can't go into the parlor for fear I'll make that up; and now you say I can't go up to my own room. I know of a grand place where I can go," he added to himself, "[illegible] are never told they are in the way there, and we can have lots of fun. I'll go down to Neil's corner. I can smoke a cigar as well as any boy, if it did make me sick the first time. They shall not laugh at me again about it."

And so the careful housekeeper virtually drove her son from the door to hang about the steps and sit under the broad, inviting portico of the village grog-shop.

Opinionless People.

The opinionless man is anxious to agree with you and everybody else in everything, and therefore he is an insincere friend. He declares that you are a saint to the man who believes you to be so, and, with just as much emphasis, asserts that you are a villain to the next man, to whom, possibly, you may have sold a horse who did not turn out as well as might have been expected, considering the price paid for him. These opinionless people are the pests of society; and when, besides being opinionless, they have an uncommon fluidity of speech, and talk all the time, one can be far happier in the neighbourhood of a hornet's nest than in their society. Really malicious men and women do not make as much mischief as they.

Bulgaria.

Bulgaria, the bone of contention, is in the way of the Czar on his march southward. It probably received Christianity from the Apostle Paul, who is recorded as having landed at Philippi. The first efforts of Russia on Bulgaria were made between 66[illegible] and 972 Anno Domini. The Greek Emperor to revenge himself on the Czar of Bulgaria induced the Czar of Russia to descend on Bulgaria with an army of 60,000 men and a thoroughly equipped fleet. He conquered the country and captured all its fortresses and then at that early date determined to establish his capital on the Danube. The Greeks did not relish the prospect of having so powerful a neighbor, and then commenced the contest of the Danube which has been kept up through all the ages since.

Sporting Item.

Gillhooly has a fine pointer, but [illegible] Smith has none.

"Let us go out hunting to-morrow," [illegible] Gus.

"But how will you get along [illegible] pog? You haven't got any."

"Of course I haven't any dog. If I had a dog of my own do you suppose I'd ask you to go along?"

nice has more than three hundred es, the finest of which is the Rialto, a marble arch over the Grand Canal, of ty-eight feet span. This bridge received name, Ponce di Rialto, "Bridge of the Scream," from the fact that for a long it was the only one crossing the Grand the broadest and deepest of the ns that wind among the islands of that anic city. It was planned by Michael and was built in 1588-91. It to have cost a sum which would be to half a million Canadian dollars. The e is very steep; but this is less of an ion here than it would be anywhere for there are no horses or carriages in e. A pathway passes over the middle; each side of it is a row of small shops (or es" as we should call them), and out- these are two other pathways. These used to be occupied by goldsmiths money changers, and every day mer- ts and bankers met on the bridge to over business affairs. You will find ns to this in Shakespeare's "Mer- nt Venice."

the Canton of Uri, Switzerland, the of the St. Gothard pass crosses the Reuss by a single stone arch of twenty feet span, rising a hundred feet above stream. This is called the Devil's ge. It was built in 1830. Previous to time the road passed over the old ge, which is twenty feet lower. This built in 1118. In 1799 the French and Austrian forces met at this little bridge, erate fighting ensued, and the stream red with blood.

he Romans built several stone arched ges across the Tiber. The first of these, the finest still standing, was the Ælian ge, now called St. Angelo's. It was by Hadrian, near his Mausoleum, n in modern times has been used as a and is called the Castle of St. Angelo. bridge received its present name from egend that an angel once appeared at entrance. As originally built, it had a of bronze roof or awning, which was rted by forty pillars; but this has en- disappeared.

nother of the famous Roman bridges was s called the Sublician, and afterward Horatian. It was built by Ming Ancus ius, was composed of wood and iron, had a "draw," to allow of the passage of boats. It was destroyed and rebuil several times, of various materials, it is said that some relics of it are still to be seen in the Tiber. The scene of Macaulay's poem of "Horatius" is laid at this bridge.

The Roman Emperor Trajan, in the first years of the second century, A. D. built an immense bridge across the Danube, near where the town of Nicopolis now stands. It had twenty arches, each one hundred and sixty feet. His successor Hadrian destroyed the bridge, to prevent the barbarians north of the Danube from using it to cross their armies and march against Rome.

Not far from Spalding, in Lincolnshire, England, near the famous Croyland Abbey, is a small stone arched bridge which is considered a great curiosity. It stands at a point where two streams unite to form a third, and is so built as to span all three.

Three half arches meet over the central point of the junction of the streams. This bridge is a thousand years old. Against the parapet at one of the entrances, sits a battered stone statue of King Ethelbald. The pathways are so steep that only foot-passengers can use it.

Some of the finest stone bridges in the world are over the Seine, in Paris; but there is nothing so peculiar in their size or construction that we need to describe them here. There are also some noble bridges over the Thames, in London, the finest of all being the Westminister Bridge, near the House of Parliament. This was completed in 1750. It is one thousand two hundred and twenty feet long, and rests on fifteen arches. Two things make its building memorable. It was the first structure of the kind for which caissons were used, and when it was nearly completed it was found that one of the piers was sinking, and the two arches resting on that pier had to be taken down and re-built. Before the re-building, the pier was sunk as far as it would go, by piling an immense number of cannon on it.

A caisson is a sort of floating box, sometimes made of timber and sometimes of iron, used instead of a coffer-dam for building piers.

(TO BE CONTINUED).

New Zealand.

The British colony of New Zealand consists of a group of islands in the South Pacific Ocean, situated about 1,200 miles from Australia, and 6,500 miles from the coast of America. Two of these islands, North and Middle, are nearly equal in size. The third, Stewart's Island, is much smaller, being about the size of Rhode Island. There are also several outlying islets. The islands are of evident volcanic origin. Their surface is mountainous, and many of the peaks are active or extinct volcanos. In the North Island are remarkable geysers and hot springs. The mountain slopes are generally densely wooded, but between them are treeless, grassy plains, well-watered and fertile. Rivers are numerous, but they are generally rapid, and are navigable for only a few miles from the coast. The climate resembles that of England, except that the seasons are reversed, January being midsummer and June midwinter. The produetions of England together with many of the fruits of warmer countries here come to perfection. Grazing is the chief occupation of a large proportion of the people, wool, hides, and tallow being the staple articles of export. Wheat and oats are also raised for the export trade, and large quantities of gold and coal mined. The gold mines, which are chiefly upon land which is property of the government, were discovered in 1857, and it is estimated that since that time they have yielded precious metal to the value of $210,000,000. The leading imports are iron and steel goods, clothing, sugar, liquors, and tea. About four fifths of all the trade is with Great Britain and her colonies in Australia. Dunedin, Auckland, Wellington, and Christchurch are the principal cities. The first has a population of about 45,000; the last of about 30,000. Wellington is the seat of the colonial government. Steamers from Melbourne and Sydney connect New Zealand with Australia, and the steamer from Sydney to San Francisco by way of the Sandwich Islands touches at Auckland on the North Island. A telegraphic cable also joins New Zealand with New South Wales. The railroads of the colony aggregate 1,500 miles; and the mileage of telegraph lines is upward of 4,000.

New Zealand was discovered by the Dutch navigator Tasman in 1642. Nearly three quarters of a century later Captain Cook, the famous English discoverer, made a more careful examination of the islands, sailing around them and passing several years in their waters. By the European peace of 1814 Great Britian was confirmed in the possession of these islands, but no steps were taken to settle them. New Zealand was nominally a dependency of New South Wales until 1840, when it became a separate British colony; land was acquired from the Maori tribes who occupied the country, and the foundations of a prosperous settlement were laid, but dishonest dealings with the natives brought about a disastrous war, which continued with varying fortune until the submission of the Maoris in 1872. Like most British colonies, New Zealand has a governor and an elective legislature, in the lower House of which the Maoris are allowed representation. Large provision is made for education, and the proportion of illiterate adults is small. Eleven twelfths of the people are of British descent, the number of Maoris not exceeding 45,000. The latter are now peaceable, and their race is declining in strength and numbers before the whites.

Two ladies out walking met a gentleman. He raised his hat to one and the other said: "Do you know that gentleman?" "Oh, yes," the other replied: "his mother was my mother's only child. What relation was the gentleman to the lady?" "Her son."

A Scotch minister on a visiting tour through his parish had occasion to pass close to a farm, the tennant of which had gone over to the Free Church. To show no spite the minister decided to enter, which he did, and found both the farmer and his wife at tea. Farmer—"There's a guid day, minister; ye're jist in time ta tak' a cup wi' us. Fill oot a cup, Janet." (Janet complies, during which the minister remarked)—"Your teapot runs very slowly, Mrs. Brown." Janet—"It dis that, minister. It's gey like yersel' when ye're preachin'—sort o' slow in the delivery."

GOLDEN HOUSEHOLD.

A Few of Doughnuts.

SOUR MILK DOUGHNUTS.—One pint of sour milk, one cup of sugar, two eggs, one-half cup of lard, one teaspoonful of soda, a little nutmeg or extract of lemon. Mix moderately stiff, roll out half an inch thick, cut in rings and fry a light brown.

CIRCLE DOUGHNUTS.—One egg, one cup of sugar, one tablespoonful of thick, sweet cream, stir well together, then add nutmeg, a little salt, and dissolve one teaspoonful of soda in one cup of sour milk; mix as soft as can be and roll out. Cut in rings.

TWIST DOUGHNUTS.—One egg, one tablespoonful of butter, one cup of sugar, one cup of sweet milk, two teaspoonfuls of cream-tartar, one teaspoonful of soda, and flavoring. Flour sufficient to mix as soft as can be rolled out. Cut off strips, twist them, and fry in very hot lard.

POVERTY DOUGHNUTS.—One cup of sour milk, one egg, two teaspoonfuls of sugar, one teaspoonful of soda and a little salt. Do not mix very hard, roll thin, cut in squares. These are very good without the egg; this recipe acquired its name in war time when sugar had to be used sparingly.

BOSTON RAISED DOUGHNUTS.—One cup of sweet milk, one-half cup of yeast, or one-quarter of a yeast cake dissolved in one-half cup of warm water. One tablespoonful of butter, one-half cup of sugar, one egg, one-half teaspoonful of spice, flour sufficient to mold. Set it away to rise, covering is closely; when light, roll out, cut into shapes and let rise again quickly and very light.

GOOD DOUGHNUTS.—One cup of sugar, one cup of sweet milk, two eggs, three teaspoonfuls of lard, one teaspoonful of soda, two teaspoonfuls of cream-tartar, a little cinnamon or nutmeg. Beat the sugar and lard together till light, then add the eggs well beaten. Mix with flour as soft as possible and have it stiff enough to roll out. Have the lard very hot, and when frying the cakes do not pierce them with a fork when turning them.

All the above recipes have been tried and are used frequently by the writer, and with the usual care in frying they will all prove good.

Economy in Fuel.

One of the most difficult things to teach a girl is economy in fuel. Nothing seems to satisfy but a continual piling on of coal. As soon as a little gas has burned off, a vigorous shaking and raking out of ashes follows; then the stove filled anew, touching and lifting the covers, which soon become red hot, and the process is repeated from morning till night. Teach her in order to obtain and secure a good draft, the coal ought never to be above the lining.

And in this connection I am reminded of another practice which seems to come to kitchen girls by intuition, or handed down by tradition; that is, to put sad irons, or flat irons as generally called, on the stove over the hottest fire, hours before use; consequetly they are ruined, for if once heated to redness, will ever after retain heat but a short time, and lose their smoothness, too. I would rather lend almost anything else to a neighbor than a flat iron. In ironing, have two holders to use alterately, thereby lessening the heat of the hand and insuring a greater degree of comfort.

Hints.

Ginghams and prints will keep their color better if washed in water thickened with flour starch. Flour is very cleansing and will do the work of soap in one or two washings in the starch water. This, with the rinsing, will be sufficient, and the goods will look fresher than if washed and starched in the old-fashioned way.

Much trouble may be avoided by keeping flat-irons in a dry place so they shall not rust, and by remembering to wipe each iron, not only the first time it is taken from the stove, but every time. Spermaceti (dropping of candles made from that substance will answer), tied into a small piece of linen, rubbed frequently on the iron seems to keep it smooth, and, I think, gives a gloss to articles stiffened with cold starch.

To clean a spice mill: If you wish to clean your spice-mill, grind a handful of raw rice in it. The particles of spice and pepper, or of coffee, will not adhere to it after the rice has passed through.

A way of treating soiled kitchen walls: Dissolve a lump of extract of logwood the size of a grain of corn in hot water and put it in four or five quarts of lime that is ready to use. One application will be as good as two without the logwood.

To scour knives easily, mix a small quantity of baking soda with your brickdust, and see if your knives do not polish better.

Work and Health.

Work, pure and simple, however hard and however constant, is rarely the cause of impairment of health, if only common hygienic precautions be observed. It is the hurried and irregular meals, and still more irregular "pick-me-ups," which do the mischief. Monotony of work is, however, in the long run, as detrimental to intellectual vigour as is a monotonous diet to the digestive functions; but relief here is easily obtained by forcible diversion of energy during some part of the twenty-four hours into another channel. The statesman, exhausted by the responsibilities and cares of office, may seek recreation in the felling of timber, while the woodcutter, if he be wise, will take his over a book or a paper by the fireside. The complete change of occupation and mental activity on Sundays must be of immense utility to the jaded bank-clerk or busy tradesman, and, if for no other reason, is highly to be commended.

A Southern Romance.

According to advices from Dawson, Ga., a wonderful phenomenon may be seen at the home of Mr. M. P. Hoyle, who resides only a few hundred yards beyond the corporate limits of Dawson. It is a constant fall of rain from a cloudless sky, the area in Mr. Hoyle's yard that is covered by the shower being about 25 feet square. Many citizens have been out to see this remarkable sight, and all testify that there is a genuine and ceaseless fall of rain drops. At times the supply of water seems greater than at others Mr. Hoyle first observed this unusual sight three weeks ago. He cannot explain the mystery.

PERSONAL.

The monument which his friends have erected, at a cost of $2,500, over the grave of the late Commander H. H. Gorringe is appropriately designed after the Egyptian obelisk which his engineering skill brought from the banks of the Nile. It commemorates a brave, noble, and scholarly man, whose death was a national loss.

Queen Victoria has received from Glasgow a present that is said to be, in charming fancy of design and exquisite workmanship, worthy of the great Bienvenuto Cellini himself. It is an elegant parasol, the handle of which is a globe of gold, representing the earth, upon which her Majesty's possessions are marked by incrustations of precious stones.

The late Charles O'Conor was a very sensitive man in his private feelings. When after a railroad accident some years ago, word came to New York that Daniel Lord was either dead or mortally wounded, Mr. O'Conor cried like a child. Again, one morning, he told his secretary, having an appointment to transact some business, "I cannot do anything this morning. I am terribly shocked. A favorite family Newfoundland dog, which was in the habit of coming to the train with me, in some unaccountable way got under the locomotive and was crushed to death before my eyes. I can't do anything to-day, I fear, at all, and you needn't wait."

Within forty years the Rev. W. H. Milburn, of Washington, has three times officiated, for several terms, as Chaplain of the House of Representatives, and it is said that no clergyman has ever been so popular in that capacity, or so reformed the attitude of the members toward religious exercises before their sessions, and toward the minister conducting these. His fine voice and presence have been very influential in this respect, and an attention is paid to the morning prayers that was unknown years ago. Dr. Milburn also treats the House as a parish, visits the members regularly, and receives them at his home, and is described as "equally esteemed by men of all faiths who meet him."

General Lew Wallace, whose Ben Hur has had a wider circulation and a greater success than any other religious book produced in this generation, has given to a contributor to the Detroit Journal some interesting reminiscences. He had completed, he says, the first part of Ben Hur, which carries the story down to the birth of Christ, when he chanced to meet Colonel INGERSOLL. At that time the General did not trouble himself to inquire into the truth of religious doctrines, but Ingersoll's talk determined him to investigate and decide for himself as to the divinity of Christ. For five years he studied the life of Christ and the history and customs of Judea and the Jews. He had gone but a few steps when he came to the conclusion that Christ was divine. When Ben Hur was completed he went to the Holy Land, and spent months in visiting every place referred to, in order to verify his work. Not one word required to be changed.

A Russian millionaire has recently had built for him in St. Petersburg a most sumptuous smoking-room, which is the astonishment of all the northern capital. Its richness consists not so much of its furniture, which is a model of simplicity, but in its walls. These are literally lined with European bank notes. Instead of the mass of white ceiling which forms the desperation of disciples of William Morris is seen a profusion of Austrian notes most artistically grouped around a blue 10 florin bank note. Charming designs composed of French, English, Italian, and Russian bank notes adorn the walls. This curious room has received many famous visitors from all parts of the compass. Among others a celebrated Hungarian painter was introduced. He glanced up at the eccentric millionaire, and said with a smile: "Sir, it is a pity you have already thus disposed of your money, for—for the same amount I would willingly have decorated your walls—perhaps more artistically, indeed, than is now the case—by covering them with paintings, even as Michael Angelo did for his Holiness Pope Julius the Second."

A Grim Discovery.

Since the annexation of Nice to France in 1870, the former Dominican church has been used as a military bakery. A few days ago it became necessary to examine the roof, and the architect was horrified to find in the garret about 600 skeletons, flung pelemele. Medical experts declared that they must have been buried at least three or four centuries ago. It appears that when Nice was occupied by the French troops in 1792, the monks were expelled from the building, and the church of St. Dominick was converted into a national bakery; and it is supposed that in carrying out the transformation the graves in the floor of the church were emptied of their contents, which were transferred to the garret, and flung there in heaps. Most of the persons interred in that church must have been members of noble families of Provence or the neighboring districts, who possessed the privilege of a place of interment within the church "for ever." The majority of the skeletons were of women; probably among them was the skeleton of a duchess of Savoy, who is known to have been buried in that church. All these remains have since been buried in one of the cemeteries o the town.

A gentleman stopping one evening at a country hotel, said to the maid servant who waited upon him, and who seemed nearly exhausted with the fatiguing duties of her situation. "I have no doubt," said he, "but you enjoy your bed when you get into it." "Indeed, no, sir," she replied, "for as soon as I lay down at night I am fast asleep, and as soon as I wake in the morning I am obliged to get up; so that I have no enjoyment in my bed at all."

The great reputation of Briggs' Electric Oil is such that it has induced unprincipled persons to adopt other names as near as possible. The proprietors of Briggs Electric Oil have the name and style of the Electric Oil registered both in Canada and the United States, and no one can use it but themselves.

Others hearing of the success of Briggs' Electric Oil have adopted other names similar, such as "Eclectric Oil," "Electron Oil," &c., and are striving to induce the public to buy them instead of the genuine Electric Oil.

In fact so determined were they that they brought a suit at Law, in the High Court of Canada, to deprive Briggs & Sons of their right to control the same; but the Courts and the Minister of Agriculture at Ottawa fully sustained their registered trade mark.

Briggs' Electric Oil cures Rheumatism, Neuralgias Sprains and Bruises, complaints arrising from Cold, such as Sore Throat, Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and difficult breathing.

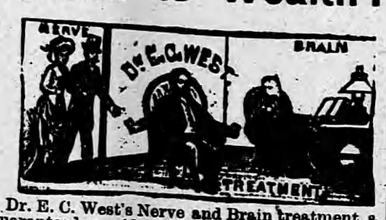
The Principle of Treatment



Toronto, August 5th, 1886.
CATARRH OF MANY YEARS STANDING CURED.

Dr. N. Washington, Throat and Lung Surgeon, Toronto and Halifax:

DEAR SIR,—I am pleased to express my extreme satisfaction at the results of your "NEW METHOD" of Inhalation which has cured me of Catarrh of a very troublesome character; in fact all the usual remedies failed to give me any relief, but your Treatment, from the first, gave great ease, and in a few months entirely cured me of a most annoying disease. I can honestly recommend any who may be suffering as I was to your skilful consideration.
Yours truly,
GEO. GOULDING,

IN LUCK.—A newspaper man in Minneapolis one day caught a young lady as she was falling on the street. A few days after he met her at the house of a friend, and they were introduced. A few months after he asked her to marry him, and she said "Yes." A few hours after they were married, and not until then, he learned that she was worth $750,000.

A REMARKABLE 5th of November. Last Friday was one of the finest days of the season, a remarkable thing for a 5th of November. We were in Toronto that day, the watering carts were buisy on the streets, a stiff breeze was blowing and the dust flying in clouds on our way home we saw running fires in the grass along the railway. Such things are not by any means common at this season of the year in Ontario.

CLOSE CALL:—On Monday night last W. T. Jackman, who has been under the doctors care for some two months, while taking his medicine about 11 o'clock, took the wrong bottle and swallowed carbolic acid instead of his prescribed medicine. He did not notice the mistake until it was down, when he immediately sent a messenger for Dr. Brodie, his physican, who promptly administered such emetics &c., as soon checked the fatal results which would have followed, and he is now out of danger.

THE children are delighted and parents highly pleased that our head teacher, Mr. Porter, has been engaged for another year. An applicant for the same position visited the school while in town the day previous to the trustees meeting for opening the tenders, and after carefully examining the state of the school and the system and order in which Mr. Porter conducted his department, stated to the trustees, that they could not do better than re-engage Mr. P. and that he was also worthy of an advance in salary.

A DEN OF THIEVES.—Last week the residence of Arthur Simpson, Bentinck, was entered by thieves and about $9 in money and a shot gun stolen therefrom. Two young fellows aged about 18, one named Jas. Bishop, generally known as Barney an emigrant boy, and another lad named Reid also an emigrant were strongly suspected and were brought before Mr. Gillis J. P. and sent up for trial. These fellows had been staying with Ed. Brennan, and he was suspected of being an accomplice as some of the goods were found at his house so Brennan and his wife were arrested. However Brennan escaped and made a dash for a swamp followed by several constables and a number of specials who surrounded the woods but so far has not been re-captured. It seems the young fellows, now in Owen Sound, are giving away their accomplices and several other parties in the neighborhood are strongly suspected of knowing too much about the thefts which have been going on for some time. There is little boubt that the two men recently sent to Kingston, and some others have been stealing anything and everything of value, as. geese, hens, pigs, sheep, grain and implemenis have been missed by many in the neighborhood, and it will be a good thing and a blessing to the section if the thieves can be traced and all safely landed in Kingston, One of the parties now under arrest is suspected of attempting highway robbery on Angus Leitch some time ago and when arrested had a revolver and a small hatchet on his person and was prepared for any kind of a job in the thieving line.—[Grey Review.

I Wonder.

Why the 5th of November passed off so quiet.

If anyone was charmed with the music in the middle of the sermon at the Methodist Church on Sunday night.

If the young men will really mix the batter for the pancakes at the pancake social.

How many trains passed over the road last Sunday.

And if they will be allowed to continue Sunday traffic.

If McColman will presist in objecting to the decision of the convention.

If so, what will be the consequence?

If the editors of the STANDARD and Advance are as good friends as they appear to be.

If they will really introduce the cash in advance system for all subscriptions.

And if so, will it not be an advantage to subscribers and the public as well as the publishers?

If the young men of Markdale are going to organize a literary and debating club.

If it would not be as much advantage for the married men to do so also.

Who painted Taylor's Candy Store sign,

If the livery man will occupy his cage just vacated.

If so, who will be the lucky bird?

A TALK ABOUT BRIDGES.

(CONCLUDED)

The Chinese have built some remarkable bridges. There is one at Foochow which is called "The Bridge of Ten Thousand Ages," and is said to be eight hundred years old. The peculiarity of it is, that the stone is used as if it were timber. Instead of arches, there are hewn stones, three feet square and over forty feet long, laid across the tops of the piers, and on these are laid flat slabs of granite to form the flooring On each side of the bridge, throughout its whole length, are small shops. It is a quarter of a mile long, and has forty piers.

At Ispahan, in Persia, there are three magnificent bridges over the River Zeinderud. The oldest of them is of brick, edged with stone, is about a thousand feet long, and rests on low stone arches. On each side there is a covered gallery, eight feet broad, several steps higher than the roadway in the middle. In cool weather one can walk on the roof of this gallery if he wishes. When it is too warm for that, the shade of the gallery is sought. For the hottest weather, when the stream is very low, there is a singular passage at the very water's edge. Imagine an arched door cut through eve y one of the piers, and stepping-stones in the water, on a line connecting these doors. You first pass through a pier, then on stepping-stones you cross the water under an arch, then pass through another pier, and so on.

There is a bridge which is a standing joke across the Rhine, connecting the towns of Great Basel and Little Basel. Each town was to build half of the bridge. Little Basel erected beautiful stone arches, reaching from its side to the middle of the stream. Great Basel, ten times as populous and wealthy, met them with a ridiculously cheap wooden bridge. And there the incongruous thing stands to this day, to point the moral of taxation the world over—always the lighter burden laid upon the strong, and the heavier on the weak.

The first cast-iron bridge erected in England is over the Severn, at Colebrookdale. It is fifty-five feet above the water, with a span of one hundred feet, and was built in 1779.

The first wrought-iron bridge was invented by Thomas Paine, the man whose reputation as an atheist had so completely overclouded his fame as a statesman and his mechanical genius. This bridge was first put up at Rotherham, England. Afterwards the materials were used in a bridge which still spans the River Wear at Sutherland. Stephenson speaks of it as a startling piece of engineering.

For a long time the greatest iron arch in the world was the central one of Southwark bridge, in London, two hundred and forty feet span; but this is surpassed by the very remarkable bridge over the Mississippi at St. Louis, which has two arches of five hundred and twenty feet span each, and two of five hundred and fifteen feet. If you imagine some steel staves, put together with steel hoops, so as to make a barrel twelve feet long and sixteen inches in diamhter, and then enough of these barrels fastened together end to end, just as gas-pipes are fastened, to make a tube about six hundred feet long, and then this tube bent to a curve so as to form an arch sixty feet high with a span of five hundred and twenty feet—you will have an idea of the peculiar feature of this bridge. Two of these immense curved tubes placed twelve feet apart one within the other, as you have seen a double rainbow, and connected by iron braces, form what is called a truss. There are four of these trusses to each span of the bridge. The whole cost of the structure was about nine millions.

The building of this bridge involved an incident which led to one of the prettiest engineering triumphs on record. When one of the great steel trusses had been floated out from the shore where it was built, and lifted into its place, it was found to be a trifle too long to fit. This subjected the engineer, Capt. James B. Eads (the same who is now constructing the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi,) to considerable mortification, especially as several rival engineers were looking on jealously and apparently hoping for the failure of the work. To take down the truss, carry it back to the shore, shorten it, and float it out and raise it again would have involved a large loss of time and money. Captain Eads ordered it to be left where it was, till he could think about it over night. The next morning he ordered the building of a light wooden trough close under the truss throughout its whole length and then had the trough filled with pounded ice. You know iron, and almost everything else, in fact, contracts with cold, and expands with heat. In a little while the cooling of the truss shortened it enough so that it fitted easily into the place prepared for it; and when the ice was removed and the metal became warm again, by its expansion it clamped itself up tighter and more securely than could have been done by any other means.

Perhaps the most famous of all iron bridges is the Britannia Tubular Bridge, over the Menai Straits, which separate the Island of Anglesea from the mainland of Wales. It may be described as consisting of two squares, wrought-iron tubes, each one thousand five hundred and thirteen feet long and about fifteen feet wide by twenty-five feet high, laid side by side so as to rest on two abutments and three piers of massive stone-work. The bottom of the bridge is one hundred and two feet above the water. The train runs inside of the tubes. The piers are continued in high towers above the point where the tubes cross them, partly for the purpose of giving the bridge greater steadiness by their weight, and partly to serve as watch towers. The portions of the tubes which form the central spans were built on shore, launched with flat-boats under them, floated down to the piers, and then raised to their places by means of powerful hydraulic presses. The engineer of this bridge was Robert Stephenson, son of George Stephenson, who invented the locomotive. It was completed in 1850, and cost him three million dollars, There are one hundred and eighty-six thousand separate pieces of iron in the tubes, and seven million holes had to be made, to put in the rivets that hold them together.

There is an iron tubular bridge, similar to the one just described, across the St. Lawrence at Montreal. It is called the Victoria Bridge; is two miles long, and cost over five million dollars. This also was built by Stephenson.

If a long iron bridge resting on piers were made fast to them, the alternate lengthening and shortening of the bridge, which is caused by the heat of summer and the cold of winter, would gradually push over the piers, and some fine day the whole would tumble into ruin. To prevent this, not only is the bridge not fastened to the piers, but small steel rollers are placed on the tops of the piers, and the bridge rests on these; so that when it lengthens or shortens the rollers turning allow it to slide back and forth harmlessly.

The Chinese have used suspension bridges made of chains, for centuries. In South America, they are made of ropes, and even of a tough sort of vine. These, however, are comparatively small affairs, though they frequently span tremendous chasms. The South American suspension bridges sway fearfully from side to side, so that it frequently requires more nerve for a stranger to cross them than it would to go over the same chasm in a balloon.

The First European chain bridge was built across the Tees, near Middleton, England, in 1741. It was seventy feet long and sixty feet high,

The largest and finest suspension bridges in the world are in the United States. The first one built in this country was put up in 1576. It had chain cables. Later they began to make them of wire, and now all suspension bridges have cables made of small wires twisted together.

A small suspension bridge was erected across Niagara River, a short distance below the falls, in 1848. It is said that communication between the two banks was established by means of a kite. The kite was raised, and allowed to fly across the river. Then it was made to tumble, and by means of the string the first wire for the bridge was draw across. Six years later this bridge was taken down, and one of the grandest bridges in the world was erected in its place. Two strong stone towers stand on the edge of each bank. Over the tops of these pass four cables, each of which is about a foot in diameter, made of small wires twisted together. The cables sag down in the middle and their ends are anchored in the solid rock some distance back from the towers. The roadway, which is level, is hung between and below these cables, by means of small wire cables or ropes, which of course are longest near the towers and shortest at the middle of the sag. There are two roadways or floors to this bridge, one above the other. The upper one is for railway trains, the lower for carriages. The span, from the towers on one side to those on the other, is eight hundred and forty-five feet. There is a beautiful suspension bridge across Ohio River at Cincinnati, which has a span of one thousand and fifty-seven feet. And a still larger suspension bridge has been built across East River, to connect the cities of New York and Brooklyn. It has a span of one thousand five hundred and ninety-five feet, and the floor is one hundred and thirty-five feet above the water. All three of these bridges were designed, and two of them were built, by the same man, John A. Roebling, who died in 1869.

A suspension bridge with a span of one thousand feet was thrown across the Ohio at Wheeling in 1848, but it was blown down, however, in 1854. One at Rochester N. Y., was broken down by a heavy fall of snow in 1857.

The finest suspension bridges in Europe are at Friburg, Switzerland, and Pesth, Hungary.

One of the most romantic things in connection with the subject of bridges was the formation of a religious order in the twelfth century, called "Brethren of the Bridge," whose object was to build bridges and establish ferries for the convenience and security of travellers. Their three most famous works were the bridges of St. Esprit, Lyons, and Avignon, all spanning the Rhone, and all consisting of stone arches. The two first named are still standing. The third had a hard fate. Pope Benedict XIII., then holding his see at Avignon, had some of the arches broken down in 1385, for his own security. A few years later the inhabitants of the city blew up their end of the bridge, to free themselves from Benedict's garrison. In 1692 three arches fell for want of repairs; and in 1670 a freshet in the Rhone, bringing down immense masses of ice, completed the work of destruction.

But one kind of bridge remains to be mentioned—the natural bridge. Eight of these are known in the United States: one in Rockbridge County, Va., one in Walker County, Ala., one in Christian County, Ky., and five in California. The one in Virginia is the most famous, and has been often described. The largest is in Callfornia. It spans a branch of Trinity River, is three thousand feet wide, and has an archway twenty feet high, with a span of eighty feet.

Perhaps you will ask me if these natural bridges are not older than a monkey bridge described at the beginning of this article. I cannot answer the question. You must inquire of the next geologist you see.

[THE END.]

Equinoctial.

BY MRS. A. D. T. WHITNEY.

The sun of life has crossed the line,
The summer shine of lengthened light
Faded and failed, till where I stand
'Tis equal day and equal night.
One after one, as dwindling hours,
Youth's glowing hopes have dropped away,
And soon may barely leave the gleam
That coldly scores a winter's day.

* * * * * * * * *

One side I see the summer fields,
Not yet disrobed of all their green,
While westerly, along the hills,
Flame the first tints of frosty sheen.
Ah, middle point, where cloud and storm
Make battle ground of this my life,—
Where, even matched, the night and day
Wage round me their September strife!
I bow me to the threatening gale;
I know, when that is over, past,
Among the peaceful harvest days
An Indian summer comes at last.

"Human natur' am a werry onsartin thing," said Brother Gardner as Elder Toots quit shuffling his feet and laid back for a nap.

Let us now purceed wid de reg'lar purceedin's."

A PREMIUM.

Waydown Bebee begged leave to announce his willingness to personally offer a premium for the best song on the close of the year, and on motion of Samuel Shin it was decided that the club should once more try the experiment of encouraging colored poets to come to the front. It was resolved to offer a premium of $10 in cash for the best poem received up to January 1, and to limit all contestants to three verses and chorus. With each poem sent in must be an affidavit that the writer is colored, and that he nor she did not copy any portion of the said poem from any published work. The points to be considered are:

1st—Color of ink.
2d—Chirography.
3d—Whether postage was paid in full or not.
4th—Rhythm and meter.

As soon as the details were settled Whalebone Howker sent to the Secretary's desk and entered the following as number one.

"Oh! de leaves am a-fallin' an' a sadness has arrove—
De shrill winds of autumn am blowin' sad an' drear;
Whicheber way we turn we am visibly reminded,
Dat we orter git our coal in an' figger on our beer.
CHORUS—Oh! de old y'ar am a-dyin'
An' us cull'd folks am sighin'
Kase we know how de cold will creep around.
De chillblains will affect us,
An' dem bunions will deject us,
An' de fellin' of hard-upness will abound.

IT DOES NOT.

The Secretary announced a letter from Dubuque, Ia., asking if the Lime Kiln Club pinned its faith to Prof. Wiggins. He was instructed to return answer that it does not. During the first three years of its existence the club paid a great deal of attention to meteorology, but finally had to face the fact that nothing could be depended on except a prediction of bad weather. Uncle Isaac Skivers, of Mississippi, a colored weather prophet, is just now coming to the front, but the club has refused to encourage him in getting up a cyclone or bringing about an earthquake.

LEFT IN THE LURCH.

A postal card was received from the Rt. Hon. Gherkin Smith, a gentleman who once lectured before the club on "The Practice of Domestic Economy," stating that he was in jail at La Porte, Ind., on a thirty-day sentence. He had been arrested and sent up for losing his pocketbook and thereby being unable to pay a two-days' board bill. He asked the club to forward him ten dollars, and promised in return to shortly appear in Detroit and deliver his new lecture on: "Disguised Blessings." Samuel Shin moved that the money be forwarded at once, but the president replied.

"Brudder Shin, you hev' had a narrer escape fum bein' fined $2,000. When de Hon. Smith was heah a y'ar ago he stopped at my house, an' our meat an' taters run out at least fo' weeks airlier dan usual. He also took away wid him two of my Sunday white shirts an' a neck-tie which cost me four shillin's. Dis club won't send him any cash, nor write him any letters of consolation. His present situation am a blessin' in disguise—if not fur him den fur a large majority of de public. As dar am no furder perishable bizness befo' de meetin' we will trambulate homewards."

Bobby: "Ma, you don't want me to play with wicked boys; do you?" Mother: "No, indeed, Bobby." Bobby: "Well, if one little boy kicks another little boy, isn't it wicked for him to kick him back?" Mother: "Yes, Bobby, very wicked." Bobby: "Then I don't play with Tommy White any more. He's too wicked. I kicked him this morning, and he kicked me back."

The Man who Has Gone to the Pole.

Col. Gilder, who started for the North Pole by way of Winnipeg a while ago, was at last accounts nearing Fort Churchill, on Hudson Bay, where he hoped to find the Eskimos who sometimes visit that trading post. These are the Chesterfield Inlet natives who accompanined Lieut. Schwatka to King William Land. Gilder lived among them for many months, and he expects to enlist some of them in his service before he starts on his formidable undertaking next spring. Upon their superior ability as Arctic travellers he relies largely for the success of his enterprises, and without their cooperation he cannot attempt the journey.

If Col. Gilder succeeds in piloting a party of Eskimos into regions where they see no certainty of ample food supplies, he will do what other explorers have tried to do and failed. Lieut. Stoney says in the report just published of his two years' work in Alaska, that one party which he started overland to the Arctic Ocean was compelled to give up the journey because their Eskimos, seeing poor prospects of game ahead, refused to go on. It was with the greatest difficulty that Lockwood persuaded his Eskimos dog driver to accompany him on his famous trip, though they were well supplied with food. Lieut. Greely says his Eskimos could not understand the purpose of exploration, dreaded field work, and were driveu along with the sledges only by promises of large presents.

In the two attempts made by Dr. Bessels of the Polaris to reach Humboldt Glacier from Lifeboat Cove, he was defeated by the refusal of the natives to keep on with him after they had reached hummocky ice. Dr. Hays said that when he started up Smith Sound, where Col. Gilder proposes to lead his Eskimos, the natives were puzzled to understand the object of his journey, and told him they never thought of entering that region except to catch bears, and then only when in danger of starving.

When Schwatka and Gilder made their brillant dash to King William Land the Eskimos with them travelled over their well-known hunting grounds, where game was in abundance. It may not be so easy to induce the native to enter the vast reigon south of Smith Sound, where game is scarce and no human beings live. The opinion has been expressed that Col. Gilder will never return from his adventuresome journey. It seems more probable that he will not be called upon to meet any very serious danger, owing to inability to induce the Eskimos to face the perils and the arduous toils of the journey he proposes.

RESCUED IN MIDOCEAN.

The Crew of a Sinking Bark Saved by the Steamship Bulgaria.

A thrilling story of rescue from a sinking ship in midocean during a terrfic gale is told by the survivors who reached Boston on the steamship Bulgaria. "It was the roughest weather that I ever experienced," said Capt. Dakin of the rescued crew. "I have been crossing the ocean twenty-two years and I never encountered such a wind. It was one of those circular [illegible]nes which it was impossible for one to stand up against. The bark Antwerp left St. John, N. B., on Sept. 9 for Tralee, Ireland. We experienced variable and severe weather. The worst was on the 30th, when off the coast of Ireland, about latitude 51°. longitude 22°. The wind on that day struck us with hurricane force, and the lee side deck load, which consisted of deals, was all adrift. At 6 A. M. on that day we had fourteen feet of water in the hold, and we were obliged to throw the deck load over to ease the ship. At 8 A. M. the ship was full of water, and on her beam ends. I ordered the spars cut away for the safety of the crew, and after that we cut the fore and maintopmasts. She then righted somewhat. At 10 A. M. we sighted a steamer bound westward, which proved to be the Bulgaria. We gave signals of distress, and she replied that assistance would be given us as soon as the state of the wind would permit. The Bulgaria passed around us several times, and at 3 P. M. sent us a lifeboat. The weather was such that it was necessary to make a connection by throwing a rope with a life preserver aboard, and then to drag us through the water to the boat. This was done at great risk of capsizing the boat. We were all rescued—ten of us in all. There were no passengers. A statement of the facts, giving our thanks to Capt. Bary and the officers of the Bulgaria, had been drawn up and signed by myself and the other officers of the Antwerp. I found it necessary to set fire to the Antwerp, as she was right in the track of the ocean steamers, and might cause trouble to others."

In Calcutta.

In the tropical climate of India a laudable common sense regulates the costume. It would be extremely uncomfortable to wear a dress-suit of broadcloth at a party. Gentlemen, therefore, who dine, say with the Viceroy, appear in the reception room in full evening dress, but, before entering the banquet hall they repair to an adjacent apartment, and change their heavy claw-hammer or swallow-tail dress-coats for white linen jackets, so that the guests present an appearance not unlike that of the waiters in some of our restaurants. This arrangement may not be strickingly picturesque, but it is sensible and comfortable. Owing to the geniality of the guests—for the most part English officers—hotel life in Calcutta is very pleasant. The curriculum through which the British army officers must pass, and in which they are examined, ensures their being scholars, and, with very few exceptions, they are gentlemen. Hence, there are no more pleasant parties than their mess dinners. The officers of English regiments in India receive both British and Indian pay, and most of them having also private means of their own, are thus enabled to live in good style. Indeed. in the three great cities of British India—Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay—the society of military officers, their wives and families, may be said to be the best. At the table d'hote of the hotels there is little restraint, and the guests speak to one another as they would at a private table.

"Do you believe in female physicians?" "Yes, for ladies. When I called in Mrs. Dr. Phillsbury to see my wife she talked scandal about the neighbors until Clara was perfectly cured and in the best of spirits."

It is said that there are not [illegible] than 2,000 buffaloes now in existence. Systematic slaughter has produced this disastrous result.

The other day a citizen of Napa, Cal., saw [illegible] in the river there what he thought was certainly the sea serpent. Closer inspection showed that the serpent was a school of fish, each about an inch and a half long. They were moving up stream in a solid column 150 feet long and about 3 feet wide. The constant commotion in the water was caused by large fish darting among them and devouring down the small fry.

John Sanford, employed in the mills at Sanford, Me., drew his month's pay the other day, and when his wife brought him his supper at 6 o'clock he handed her the money at her suggestion. He worked until 8 o'clock and then went home where he found his two children, both babies, on the floor alone, apparently having fallen out of bed. Their mother had run away with Jack Sherburn, an old admirer of hers.

The Rev. A. A. Horton of Sheffield was walking home from Tiona the other night when six men stopped him and demanded his money. He handed them 75 cents. They searched him for more, found none, and told him to go on. As he went Mr. Horton made this remark: "Gentlemen—excuse the expression—the next time you hold up a stranger, be sure that he is not a Methodist preacher."

The other day the Rev. Francis Hall of North Washington, Me., while looking for his cow in the woods, came face to face with a big black bear. Though 70 years of age, the clergyman shinned up a tree with remarkable celerity, and the bear, apparently not caring to take the trouble to climb after him, looked him over for a while and then strolled off. Thereupon Mr. Hall came down and went home in quicker time than he had made for years before.

The other day, on a railroad near San Francisco, a train missed a switch, which should pass another train, and the two engines ed directly towards one another on the same track. One of the engineers, quick as thought, disconnected his engine from the train, blew for down brakes, and then put the engine ahead to meet the other, reducing the force of the collision, and saving the passengers. Fortunately the other train was able to reduce its speed, and the shock when it came, was comparatively slight. Both the plucky and level-headed engineers escaped unhurt.

A rat was put into a box with a rattlesnake in Sacramento the other day. Instantly the snake struck it, and in a moment the rat turned over and died. It was then swallowed by the rattler. The next day another rat was put in the box. The snake made no movement toward it, but the rat at once attacked the snake, which in defense itself struck its enemy several times. The bites had no apparent effect on the rat, which after a while was released, and ran away seemingly none the worse for its battle. It would seem to indicate that for a considerable time after expending its virus a rattlesnake is harmless.

Sister Baptista of St. Joseph's Hospital in Philadelphia, has charge of the ward devoted to the treatment of drunkards, and her success with that class of patients is said to be remarkable. She has effected some notable cures, but there is one case she cannot cure. He is over 60 years of age, has retired from business with some $200,000, and has for years been a regular patient of Sister Baptista. The whiskey habit is chronic with him, but as he has no immediate relatives or friends to nurse or care for him when he breaks down from excessive drink, he is received at the hospital whenever he applies, which is at frequent intervals.

HEALTH.

"The Wages of Sin is Death."

The inspired author of these words doubtless had reference to moral sins, but the sentence of death is as surely executed upon transgressors of physical, as of moral laws. The days when disease and death were regarded by intelligent persons as dispensations of Providence, have long since passed. Science has poured upon the causes of disease a brilliant light of discovery and research, until the material causes which produce disease are almost as well understood as the elements of any common problem in algebra or geometry. One plus typhoid fever germs, plus pure milk plus small-pox infection, will as surely produce typhoid fever or small-pox in a susceptible person as two plus two will make four, or ten times ten, one hundred.

This is very useful as well as interesting to study the statistics of death in any civilized community. At the recent Sanitary Convention at Coldwater, Mich., Dr. H. B. Baker, Secretary of the State Board of Health of Michigan, read an able paper on the prevention of contagious and infectious diseases, in which he pointed out a number of very important and interesting facts gathered from the vital statistics of Michigan. According to the annual reports published by the Secretary of State, 3,700 persons die annually in Michigan alone, of these diseases: small-pox, scarlet fever, typhoid fever, and diphtheria. It is well known that only about half of the deaths are reported, so these figures should be doubled, making over 7,000 deaths from these four diseases, all of which are preventable. Is not this an enormous sacrifice to ignorance or carelessness or both? What are these seven thousand lives worth? The lowest estimate of the cash value of a human life is $1,000. This would represent a loss of $7,000,000. But there are more than eight or ten persons sick for every one who dies, and for each one there is loss of time, and other expenses, aggregating not less than one hundred dollars, making at least another $7,000,000, or $14,000,000 in all, which is lost every year through sickness and deaths due to four preventable diseases. The loss of friends, genius, of leaders of great enterprises, and damage to society, these and many other losses are not included in this estimate.

Is it not a fearful thought that this enormous waste of human life is unnecessary, the result of criminal ignorance or criminal carelessness? The State Board of Health of Michigan has for years been laboring to enlighten the people of the State respecting the means of avoiding and preventing disease, and it was clearly shown that a great deal had been done. Within ten years the average annual number of deaths from small-pox has been diminished by fifty. This means fifty lives saved every year, or five hundred lives in twenty years; and fifty five thousand cases of illness from this loathsome disease have been saved within the same time. And yet there are people who begrudge the few thousands necessarily expended in this beneficent work!

Whooping-Cough.

Whooping-cough is a highly contagious fever, affecting the entire system, but specially manifesting itself in an inflammation of the bronchial tubes, and a spasmodic cough occurring in frequent paroxysms. The whoop is due to the rapid coughing. This renders it impossible to draw in the breath until the coughing ends, when the breath enters strongly through the glottis, still partially contracted by the spasm.

It rarely ends in less than six weeks; generally its run is longer, sometimes many months. As a rule, the physician merely aims to palliate the symptoms, guard against complications, and abridge somewhat the attack. Says Flint, "It must be admitted that there are no known means by which the affection may be arrested."

A writer in the Lancet for March, 1886, thinks that the prevalent treatment has been directed too much to the symptoms, instead of to the cause. Hence the medicines prescribed have simply had an anti-spasmodic and sedative effect—relieving the cough, but not reaching the disease itself. During a severe epidemic of whooping-cough, he noticed on several occasions a marked alleviation of the symptoms, and then at other times a marked aggravation. This led him to suspect some powerful atmospheric influences at work. On consulting his charts, he found that the former condition corresponded to a high per centage of ozone in the air, and the latter to a very low per centage.

Ozone being a natural antiseptic (preventive of putrefaction), he at once commenced to treat his patients with antiseptic medicines, taken internally. The result was very favorable. The method was confirmed by further experience, proving satisfactory in almost every case.

Hygiene in the Cure of Disease.

The progress of hygienic medicine in the last fifty years is the medical fact of the present age, and the fact that will stand out in boldest relief when the history of this period shall be written by some future Esculapian scholar.

But, rapid and effective as this progress has been, the principles of hygiene are yet in their infancy. We have learned to appreciate the true value of hygienic principles in the prevention of diseases of the epidemic type; and the medical profession, throwing aside all selfish recollections, has been the first to teach the practice of these principles and to prove their force and vitality. The next step in the way of advancement is to demonstrate that the same principles are as useful and as necessary in the treatment of actual disease as they are in prevention.

A great advantage in the hygienic treatment of disease is, that it does not, or at least need not, interfere with sound and experience-proved modes of treatment of a medicinal kind. The scientific physician finds, in fact, that there is always a consistent plan for combining the medicinal and hygienic systems. He sees that the two systems are one; he sees further that the mere medicinal plan without the hygienic is in all cases imperfect and in some cases worse than imperfect.

Notes.

A girl was taken before the Paris tribunal charged with stealing a blanket. She pleaded that she was under the influence of another person, and acted readily under the commands of others, doing anything that was told her. She was examined by a commission of Charot, Brouardel and Mollet, who reported that this condition came from the use of morphia, suffering and hunger. That these suggestions from others, acting on an unstable nervous organism, greatly deranged by morphia and other causes, rendered her irresponsible for her acts. She was acquitted.

In persistant hemorrhage from the nasal cavity, plugging the posterior nares should not be done until an attempt has been made to check the hemorrhage by firmly grasping the nose with the finger and thumb, so as completely to prevent any air from passing through the cavity in the act of breathing. This simple means, if persistently tried, will in many cases arrest the bleeding. The hemorrhage persists because the clot that forms at the rupture in the blood-vessel is displaced by the air being drawn forcibly through the cavity in attempt of the patient to clear the nostrils. If this air is prevented from passing through the cavity, the clot consolidates in position and the hemorrhage is checked.

The ten commandments for bathers: 1. Do not bathe when excited. 2. Do not bathe when feeling badly. 3. Do not bathe after having been up all night or after excessive exertion, before resting several hours. 4. Do not bathe after having taken a heavy alcoholic drink. 5. Walk slowly to the bathing place. 6. Inquire after the depth and the current of the water as soon as you arrive there. 7. Undress slowly, but then go into the water at once. 8. Jump into the water with your head first or wet the head quickly if you cannot do the first, 9. Do not remain in the water long, especially if you are not very strong. 10. After the bath rub the body well to aid the circulation of the blood and take moderate exercise. Bathing and swimming is useful for body and soul, not alone in warm but also in cool weather, if above advice is heeded.

A Romantic Career.

The history of Prince Torlonia, whose death was announced recently, is a series of surprises. The family were of French origin and came from Auvergne, the original name being not Torlonia, but Tourlogne. The founder of the great banking family was servant to Cardinal Aquaviva, who in his will left him a provision for the rest of his life.

The valet invested the money in lace and needles, and did a good trade with these small wares, and was able to educate and push forward his son, who early showed decided ability for finance. He was patronized by Pius VI., and employed by him to carry out a series of monetary operations, all of which were brilliantly successful. The name of Tourlogne was now abandoned, and Giovanni Torlonia founded a bank, and money multiplied with him.

On his death in 1829 he left his son, Alexander Torlonia, a fortune of 40 millions. Alexander inherited not only his father's wealth but also his capacity for business. The 40 millions invested in the purchase of a monopoly of tobacco, stretching over thirty years, increased enormously, and Prince Torlonia found that while the other Roman nobles were growing yearly more impoverished, money was fructifying in his coffers. He employed it in princely hospitality and in ventures of enormous magnitude, and both methods of investment were prosperous. The draining of the Lake Fucino, a work which several of the Roman Emperors had commenced and abandoned, was successfully carried out at a cost of 35 millions, and Victor-Emmanuel celebrated this great engineering achievement by presenting the Prince with a gold medal specially struck for the occasion. The Prince's enormous wealth passes to his daughter, married to one of the Borghese family, who takes the name and title of Torlonia.

FORTY YEARS AGO.

There was time to live.
Men slept yet in their beds.
The epoch of haste not come.
The saddle was the emblem of speed.
Brawn and brains went hand in hand.
A day's journey was a serious matter.
We were still a nation of handworkers.
The highways were dusty and populous.
No house contained a sewing machine.
The canvas-covered wagon was the ark of trade.
The turnpike was still the great artery of trade.
There was not a mower or harvester in existence.
The land was lighted with candles after nightfall.
Butter was unmarketable 100 miles from the dairy.
The steam saw-mill had just begun to devour the forest.
The lord of 1,000 acres sat with his harvesters at dinner.
The day began with the dawn and not with the train's arrival.
The spinning-wheel and shuttle sounded in every farmer's house.
He who counted his possessions by the square mile kept open house for the wayfarer.
The rich were lavish in an abundance which was not yet coveted by the keen eye of commerce.
From east to west was the pilgrimage of a life; from north to south was a voyage of discovery.

The Heat in India.

The editor of Outing has just received from Thomas Stevens, the globe-girdling cyclist, a letter dated Delhi, India, in which he says: "The weather is oppressively hot; journey barely possible this season of the year (August) even by taking things very leisurely." Some idea of the temperature may be imagined when we state that, with every appilance to mitigate the heat, in the shape of punkahs, water soaked cuss-cuss tatties, hung across the doorways of the houses, etc., the thermometer indoors often registers 120 degrees for weeks together.

Twelve men are to be indicted for the assault on Mayor Malhsot, of Three Rivers, and for three of the accused, Hamel, Mayrand, and Michand, whom the Magistrate has decided were the ringleaders in the riot, bail will not be accepted.

Last week the Saved Army barracks at Roblin was destroyed by fire, and almost at the same moment their barracks at Davies' Corners suffered destruction in the same way. Incendiarism is suspected in connection with both conflagrations.

After a recent fire in Lucknow a number of persons soaked through and through with whiskey went through the streets of the village singing and shouting, and smashing doors and windows. No arrests have been made, however, and it has not been shown where the rowdies obtained the liquor.

A great slaughter of geese is reported from Beaver Lake in the North-West. Two men named Fraser have killed 1,000 and are having them cured as dry meat for winter use. Many other persons have killed from 50 to 100 each, and a local merchant named John Brown is reported to have killed 200 in four days.

Joseph Godfrey, a young married man of Talbotville, disappeared the other night. He left a note in his bed stating that he would not return. He leaves behind him a wife to whom he had been married but a year and who is about to become a mother. She is almost destitute and is now residing with a neighbor.

Mr. Charles Warren, of Alnmette Island, owns a turkey which, in the month of June, laid a nest of eggs and hatched them out, and the young turkeys were given to another turkey. She again resumed laying, and brought out a second brood of turkeys. When the last turkeys were two weeks old she again resumed laying for the third time, and has laid one egg every day since.

A daughter of Mr. Joseph Griffith, of St. Thomas, took a black-and-tan terrier named Tuck belonging to her father, to Brantford with her a few weeks ago, but he was soon missed at Brantford, and in a few days after his departure he turned up a little the worse of wear but in apparent good spirits at his home in St. Thomas. Whether he beat his way home by train or crossed the fields for a short cut has not been determined.

In the Assize court, Ottawa, Thursday morning the jury returned a verdict of $700 damages with costs against Daniel Doyle, contractor, in the suit of Mrs. Murphy, widow of John Murphy, killed last August by the caving-in of the sides of an excavation claimed to be improperly shored. The amount sued for was $10,000. It was a joint action against the contractor and the city, but Judge Galt entered a non-suit for the city.

The payment of the Treaty money to the Indians at Whitefish Lake and Lac la Biche has been postponed, on account of epidemic of measles. Numbers of Indians have died, and many are sick. At last accounts the sickness had reached Lesser Slave Lake, and many were sick and dying there. Measles are particularly fatal to the Indians and Halfbreeds, on account of their habits of life and the constant exposure to which they are subjected.

A young man engaged by Mr. Lobsinger, Carlshue, to assist at making cider, was to receive twenty-five cents a day and his board in compensation for labor performed. One evening the young man did not partake of any supper, the reason assigned being that he had eaten so many apples and drunk so much cider that he was "much full," and demanded from his employer ten cents, the value laid upon the meal which he had missed. His demand was not granted.

Lone Man is held a prisoner at Fort Saskatchewan for being party to the murder of McIvor on the South Saskatchewan during the rebellion. Saud Fly, another Indian, was also engagad in the killing. Lone Man declares he gave himself up to Governor Dewdney, and that the White Beard forgave him for killing McIvor, a story which is regarded questionable. Lone Man is not pleased with his position in the guard room, and recently was detected trying to pick the lock of his shackles with a bent nail.

Workmen engaged in clearing away logs at the False Creek, B. C., found a human skeleton with the head imbedded in the roots of a tree. The remains are believed to be those of a negro, and it is supposed they were buried many years ago, as the tree was between twenty and thirty years old. Terrible crimes were of frequent occurrence in this district about a quarter of a century ago, and it is presumed that the negro was the victim of foul play, and that the crime has remained hidden for all these years.

With Satisfaction.

Polson's Nerviline, the new and certain pain cure, is used with satisfaction in every instance. There is abundant reason for this, for it performs all that is claimed for it. Nerviline is a never-failing cure for cramps, pains in the side or back, lumbago, sore throat, chilblains, toothache. Nerviline is in fact a sure remedy for all pains, both internal and external. Try a 10 cent bottle. Large bottles only 25 cents, by all druggists.

CANADA'S TIMBER LANDS.

Statistics of the Product and the Question of its Exhaustion.

An Ottawa despatch to the New York Herald says:—There has been much speculation of late as to the possibility of the lumber supply of the Dominion becoming exhausted in a very few years. The several provincal governments have been giving their attention to the matter, which is likely to prove of such vital importance to the interests of the country, with a view to devising some means by which this great industry may be preserved. Mr. Ward, an accredited authority, estimates that the Province of Ontario furnishes 4,474,000 pieces, equal to 3,600,000 of standard pine logs of 200 feet each, producing 520,000,000 feet of lumber, 6,790,000 cubic feet of white and red pine, or 81,000,000 feet, board measure; dimension timber, 23,000,000 feet, board measure; hardwood, cedar, etc., equal to 5,000,000 feet, making in the aggregate 635,500,000 feet, board measure, paying to the Provincial Government for timber dues annually $501,000, and ground rents $46,000, with 28,000 square miles under license.

The Province of Quebec has under license 48,500 square miles, producing 2f400,000 square pine logs, equal to 386,000,000 feet, board measure, and 1,308,000 spruce logs, producing 106,600,000 feet, board measure; white and red pine timber, 3,110,000 cubic feet, equal to 37,320,000 feet, board measure; hardwood, 51,000 cbbic feet, or 611,000 feet board measure; railway ties, 143,000 pieces, 32 feet each, making 4,575,000 feet board measure; tamarac, 165,000 feet, board measure; hemlock, 34,000 feet; cordwood equal to 5,000,000 feet, making in all 549,976,000 feet, giving a gross revenue to the province of $668,596.

The cut in New Brunswick is estimated at 160,000,000 feet of all classes, principally spruce. The pine, once so plentiful in this province, has become nearly exhausted. The above figures regarding New Brunswick, however, only refer to the cut on Government lands. There is a large extent of private lands held in the province which pays no tribute to the treasury. These limits are estimated to produce annually 500,000,000 feet of lumber and timber, three-fourths of which is exported, the balance being required for home consumption. The extent of the territory is 17,500,000 acres. 10,000,000 of which is granted and located, leaving 7,500,000 acres still vacant, and giving to the Government an annual revenue for timber, ground rent, &c., of $152,000.

Edie.

BY ARCHIE MACK.

In a peaceful country cottage
Joy and sunshine reigned supreme,
Laughing children round the doorstep
Sporting on the grass-spot green,
Formost of them all in frolic
Was a nut-brown maid of four,
Proudly happy, gazed the mother
On her darlings, from the door.

But upon her darling Edith Dwelt her eyes more fondly still,
And a throb of deeper pleasure
Caused the mother's heart to thrill.
Tiny was her darling's figure,
More like humming bird or bee
Flitted she amongst the others,—
'Twas a goodly sight to see.

Edie, pet of all the household,
Idol of her parents' hearts,
Like a beam of summer sunshine
Gleaming bright, ere it departs.
Merry eyes of darkest hazel,
Laughing, roguish, full of glee,
Skin as brown as any berry,—
What a dimpled darling she!

Here and there she stops and lingers,
Casts a roguish glance behind,
Coquettish, yet full of meaning,
Mischievous, yet oh, so kind!
Happy, inerry, little darling,
Mother's pride, the nut-brown maid,
Sister's, pet and brother's idol,
Father's joy, in all arrayed.

* * * * * * * *

All the joy has now departed
From that happy cottage home,
Broken-hearted is the father,
Sad, oh, sad the mother's moan!
For their loved and cherished darling
Death's stern hand has snatched away,
Clouding all their happy sunshine
O'er with sorrow's clouds of gray.

Dark as midnight seems their pathway,
But a star shines bright and clear
High above the clouds of sorrow
That surround their pathway here.
High in heaven, each day more brightly,
Shines that clear, effulgent ray,
Thus, unto the gates of Heaven,
Angel Edie leads the way.

Advice to Consumptives.

On the appearance of the first symptoms, as general debility, loss of appetite, pallor, chilly sensations, followed by night-sweats and cough, prompt measures of relief should be taken. Consumption is scrofulous disease of the lungs; therefore use the great anti-scrofulous or blood-purifier and strength-restorer, Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery." THE BUTTER PROBLEM.

That Canadian farmers are loosing millions of dollars anually on account of the poor quality of butter made, and consequent low price realized for this staple article, no one will stop to question, but the great problem is to find a tangible remedy for this deplorable state of affairs.

The profits of farming have been so reduced, that every available means will be eagerly adopted towards improving the quality and lessening the cost of producing the various products, and besides, that branch of husbandry which yields the best return for capital and labor invested, will be closely watched, and receive special attention.

The most successful class of agriculturists of to-day, are those who follow mixed husbandry; that is, they do not rely solely on one kind of grain or even all kinds, but a rotation of the various kinds of grain together with stock and dairy, and the latter is claimed to be at the present period, the most profitable, notwithstanding the very unsatisfactory state of the butter trade.

Now, to come back to the butter question, there seems to be no probability of an improvement under present circumstances: While butter is purchased by storekeepers, from their customers, and the price about the same for all kinds, (butter and grease) what inducement is there on the part of farmers and their wives to improve the quality?

Then in the first place a new method of purchasing butter must be introduced. It cannot be expected that a store keeper will risk loosing a customer who leaves him say $200 a year, by offering two cents per lb. less for his butter than his next neighbor received, while there may be fully four cents per lb. difference in the quality of the article: when looking at it from this standpoint (and we think it a reasonable one) we do not wonder that the butter trade is unsatisfactory. The local merchants cannot act as a stragger would in the purchase of butter, though he may be an expert in judging the article; then there should, in our opinion, be an inspector appointed to inspect, and brand each tub with its true grade. One inspector could do the work of, say six villages, one for each day in the week, having a certain day appointed for each village, for butter market; and as for the inspectors salary, we imagine our merchants would cheerfully bear that expense, and find it a paying investment. Until butter is made in creameries. (as we claim it all should be,) the above system would doubtless raise the grade and therefore very materially increase the profit of the dairy.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The demonstration in the interest of the Reform Party of East and South Grey held at Flesherton last Thursday was fairly attended and very respectably conducted. There must have been nearly 400 present, a good sprinkling of whom were ladies; this latter doubtless had a salutary effect on the meeting.

The following prominent Liberals were present, viz—B. Allen, M. P. for North Grey, Dr. Landerkin, M. P. South Grey, Mr. Irvine, nominee for South Grey and Mr. Cleland of Meaford, nominee for North Grey, each of whom briefly addressed the audience. Mr. John Gordon of Flesherton occupied the chair while Mr. W. G. Pickell read an address of welcome to Sir Richard Cartwright, who addressed the assembly for nearly three hours, has a clear musical voice, good delivery, excellent and abundant language and sufficent wit and humor for seasoning.

His criticisms are on the whole very fair while he handles his subject with ability, which holds the close attention of his hearers and begets a feeling of respect from all classes. He is not one of those who says things to create excitement and elicit applause, hence the noisy element was not encouraged and the best of order prevailed.

A RADICAL CHANGE.—Daniel Sullivan, of Malcom, Ont., takes pleasure in recommending Burdock Blood Bitters for dyspepsia. It cured him after years of suffering. From being a sceptic he is now a confirmed believer in that medicine.

—THREE ABLE AND HONEST MEN were nominated to the Mayoralty of New York, Abram Hewitt, the nominee of the Democratic party, which has, perhaps, the strongest organization, was elected. He now proposes to associate with himself his opponents, Messrs. George, the Labor candidate, and Roosevelt, the Republican candidate, in a sort of committee to put down corruption and mismanagement. This looks a little like the millennium. Who would have expected to see it make its first appearance in New York politics.

—ONE more Province will soon be added to the confederation. The North-West terrtiory comprising the district of Saskatchewan, Assiniboia and Alberta have settled their differences, and it now only needs the sanction of the Dominion Government to make legal the agreement to which they have come as to their local representation, and to premit them also to return jointly four members to the next Dominion House. Confederation is extending, not breaking up.

PROF LOW'S MAGIC SULPHUR SOAP.—Healing, smoothing and cleansing for all eruptive diseases of the skin. Delightful for toilet use.

EVERY-DAY MANNERS.

Children who are not taught good manners cannot be made to appear otherwise than uncouth and possible rude when company comes to the house. Their daily home-life, and the manners of those with whom they are constantly associated, are examples they inevitably follow. Scenes like the following are sufficienly common to be recognized as truthful by the reader:

A lady makes an afternoon call upon a mother. The children half-a-dozen in number perhaps, surrounds the visitor with marked signs of interest in her personal appearance.

"It is a very pleasant day," the caller says.

"Yes, very. Mary' run and sit down; Janie, don't touch the lady's dress,"

"Are your family all well?"

"Oh yes, thank you. Tommy don't stare so at the lady."

"How do you do, little girl?" asked the caller pleasantly.

The little girl puts her finger in her mouth.

"Can't you talk child?" asked the mother, sharply. Why don't you say, "I am well, thank you?"

"I'm very well, if you please," returns the child with a giggle.

"There now' don't giggle. Take your finger out of your mouth. Jane, get off the back of the lady's chair. Run away, all of you?',

"I haven't seen you out lately," the caller says.

"No; I've been very busy. My family requires all of my time. With several children one can't give much thought or interest to anytything but home duties."

"Do you go to school?" asks the lady of Johnnie.

"Hey?"

"Why, John Brown! Now that's a nice way to answer the lady! Never say hey' to anybody. Now answer nice.'

"Yes um! I go to school."

"Yes um! Say 'yes, ma'am.' A person would think you children had never been taught how to behave."

Very natural a person would think so.

$1,500,000 Fire in Southampton.

Southampton, Ont., Nov. 4.—Early this morning the row of buildings known as the Rossin Block and occupied by James Kelly, were discovered to be on fire. In a few minutes the block was one mass of flames, on account of the strong gale of wind blowing from the south-west. The fire soon spread to an adjoining house and thence to the Busby House, which was soon all ablaze. The villagers worked like heroes to stop the flames, but as no fire engine was available the flames soon spread to the adjoining buildings, and in less than four hours the whole street was swept for two and one-half blocks from street to street. This is the greatest conflagration that has ever occurred in this district. There were over 50 buildings burnt, and thirty families are rendered homeless and some entirely destitute, and unless assistance is given at once some families will want. The total loss is about $60,000, with only about $12,000 insurance. The following are the heaviest loosers:—E. S. Busby $6,000; Alex. Spence, $2,000; Irwin Rusk, $3,000; John Woods, $,500; B. A. Belyea, $2,000; D. Teahan, $3,000; W. Gilbert, $3,500; Episcopal Church, $2,000; Thos. Lee, $1,500; R. Buckley, $1,000. Great praise is due to the Port Elgin fire brigade, who came to the rescue and worked with a will.

THE latest remedy for Coughs, Cold, Croup, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, etc., McGregor's Lung Compound. There is no remedy in existence containing any one of the active ingredients composing McGregor's Lung Compound, so do not say you have taken everything until you have tried this for your cold or cough, and your opinion will be the same as all who have used it, viz., that it is the best. Sold in 50c. and $1.00 bottles by R. L. Stephen, Druggists, Markdale. 1

A Flying Lunch.

One of the innovations introduced by the Canadian Pacific Railway is worthy of imitation on other roads. As we were on the road from Ottawa to Montreal, an energetic acrobat in a white apron came through the cars with lunches. The lunch consisted of sandwiches, cakes and such, together with tea or coffee. When he got an order he spread before the hungry traveller a neat little table covered with a snowy cloth. He carried the coffee and things like a balancer at a circus through the swaying cars. The coffee was in neat little silver pots, and the cups and saucers were of the prettiest China. Each pot held about two cups of coffee, and the charge for a pot of hot coffee was ten cents. Sandwiches were also ten cents each. It was worth the price of admission to see the waiter carry the trays without spilling or upsetting anything. The coffee was simply superb, and I hope when the C. P. R. gets through with the fellow who makes it, that he will take a tour around the country and teach hotel folks how to get up good coffee.—[Look Sharp, in Detroit Free Press.

McGREGOR'S SPEEDY CURE.

When we say McGregor's Speedy Cure is the only perfect cure for Dyspepsia, Liver Complaints, Indigestion and Impure Blood, we are telling plain facts, of which hundreds upon hundreds can testify who have been restored to perfect health by its use. We would therefore advise you strongly if you are a subject of any of the above troubles to give McGregor's Speedy Cure a trial and be convinced. It is sold in 50c. and $1.00 bottles at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store. 2

WHAT TRUE MERIT WILL DO.

The unprecedented sale of Boschee's German Syrup within a few years, has astonished the world. It is without doubt the safest and best remedy ever discovered, for the speedy and effectual cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung troubles. It acts in an entirely different principle from the usual prescriptions given by Physicians, as it does not dry up the Cough and leave the diseas still in the system, but on the contrary removes the cause of the trouble, heals the part affected and leaves them in a purely healthy condition. A bottle kept in the house for use when the disease make their appearance, will save doctor's bills and a long spell of serious illness. A trial will convince you of these facts. It is positively sold by all druggists and general in the land. Price, 75 cts., large bottles. E. O. W.

"What is McGregor's Speedy Cure for? It is for Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Indigestion, Biliousness, and it is the finest blood purifier in the known world to-day. 'Does it give satisfaction?" We cannot point to one instance where it did not. "Where does it have the largest sale?" Right in the City of Hamilton, where it is manufactured, there has been over one thousand dollars' worth sold in the last year retail, and the greater majority of the sale is by one recommendation it to another. For sale at 50c. and $1.00 per bottle by R. L. Stephen's, Drug Store Markdale. 3

HOUSEHOLD.

Household Hints.

The stovepipe can be cleaned by putting a piece of zinc on the coals of a hot fire. The vapor produced carries off the soot by chemical decomposition.

An excellent way of cooking eggs is to break them into boiling milk, without beating. Cook slowly, stirring now and then. When done soft pour into a dish and add a little salt and pepper.

Iron rust is readily removed by equal parts of common salt and cream of tartar, moistened with water and applied to the stained spots and placed in the sunshine. Moisten as it becomes dry, for two or three hours.

Stale buns may be made to taste as nicely as when fresh if they are dipped for a moment or so in cold water, and then put in a hot oven for five or ten minutes; they will turn out as light and crisp as when first baked.

Pour boiling water over the raisins, let them stand a few minutes to soften, then drain the water off and you are ready to proceed. No more trouble with sticky fingers. Just pinch the seeds out at the stem; a knife will expedite matters a little, though not essential.

Rusty black lace can be freshened by washing it in borax water. After it is partially dry dip it in water in which an old kid glove has been boiled and some indigo blue added. Then stretch the lace out well and either iron it on the wrong side or press till dry with a heavy weight.

If you have any old cane-bottomed chairs which want recaning, you may make the seats useful with thick colored wool twine. Cut away the old cane first, and thread a long, stout darning-needle with the twine. Knot the ends, loop it through the holes backward and forward, crosswise from side to side, right and left, and, every hole being filled, work them back again, weaving as you would for cloth, so you must be careful not to draw the threads very tight the first time over, or it is more difficult to weave. Finally, press the pair of threads together.

In buying table linen, the finer, smaller the pattern the longer it will last. When table-cloths are half-worn, or past use as such, the best parts may be cut into table napkins, and if neatly hemmed few will notice that they are not of a regular pattern; or these pieces may be used to lay under boiled fish for serving, or they will be found very convenient for wrapping cake before putting it away in a tin box, for covering bread, and a score of other uses in the kitchen; for it is never well to leave food, after it is cold, uncovered and exposed to air, dust, and flies.

Fruits, which are so healthful and cooling, make dire stains on table linen and clothing. Such stains can be removed from white goods by pouring boiling water through them, provided that the spots have not been first wet in cold water. If they have, or are of long standing and refuse to disappear before this simple treatment, dip them in water to which has been added chloride of lime in the proportion of one tablespoonful of the chloride to each quart of water. If the stains are very deep let the article remain in the water fifteen or twenty minutes, then hang in the sun without wringing. Fruit stains on colored goods are more serious matter. Boiling water is the best thing to use, for it will not injure the most delicate color or fabric. Other remedies take out the color, so it is well to attend to all such stains while they are fresh.

There is generally too much time spent in the daily dusting of the house. Many advise that all things be carefully gone over with a duster or dampened cloth, to take up every particle of dust. Now a damp cloth cannot be used either on varnished or oiled furniture without taking off the gloss. A chamois skin, dampened, is sometimes used with excellent effect on varnished furniture, and that only should be used at regular intervals. The best plan is to open the windows, and, if necessary, the doors, so as to make as much draft as possible. Have a stiff brush (they are shaped like a paint brush, and are intended for stuffed furniture) and brush and clean well about the cracks and folds, if there is stuffed furniture; for a floating fluff that seems to come from mysterious distances is found about most houses, especially those in towns and cities. Then for fine furniture use the finest and softest feather brush you can get, flipping up the dust, so as to force it in the direction of the windows. Have coarser feather dusters for coarser furniture, and try to force the dust up into the centre of the room, so as to reach the draught and float out. In this way a room may be dusted in ten minutes that would otherwise take from three-quarters of an hour to one hour to dust with cloths. If there is any doubt about dust being left, pin a large damp cloth about a broom and go over the carpet with it. This will take up all the dust that falls, and prevent more from rising. It takes but a few minutes for this process, if once practiced in it. All modes that shorten the dusting of a large house are a positive gain of time. Where there is much bric-a-brac the process is interminable unless the delicate portion is under glass, where it ought to be to save breakage.

Cooking Recipes.

Boiled Carrots.—Scrape and wash them, then split them in two, if very large, into four, and cut them across; they require long boiling to make them soft.

Stewed Veal.—Lay a knuckle of veal in a saucepan with two blades of mace, an onion, a small whole peper and some salt with two quarts of water; cover it close and let it simmer for two hours.

Beef Broth.—Take a leg of beef, cut it in pieces, put in two or three blades of mace, some parsley and a crust of bread; boil it till the beef is tender, toast bread and cut into dice, but it in a dish, lay in the beef and pour on the broth.

Haricot Mutton.—Make a good gravy by boiling the trimmings, seasoning it with pepper and salt. Strain and add carrots, parsnips and onions previously boiled tender. Slice them in, then pepper and salt the mutton, broil it brown; put it into the gravy along with the vegetables, and stew all together ten minutes.

Minced Veal.—Cut the meat from the bones, and having minced it very fine with a small piece of lemon peel, grate over it a little nutmeg, and sprinkle on some pepper and salt. Put the bones into a sauce pan with a large onion chopped fine and water enough to moisten well, thicken with a little flour and butter and serve on buttered toast.

Tapioca Pudding.—Take six tablespoonfuls of tapico and soak it in milk for some hours before you intend to use it; when you are going to make your pudding, put the tapioca into a quart of milk, place it on the fire, and, as soon as it boils, sweeten it to your taste and let it simmer for a quarter of an hour. Pour it into a basin and stir in a little fresh butter and three eggs well beaten, Bake one half hour.

Stewed Steak.—Take some slices of beef, pepper and salt them well, slice up a couple of onions thin and lay a piece or two of the fat of the steak at the bottom of a clean saucepan, then some of he onions and on that more steak, and so on alternately till you have put all in; shake and turn it about frequently to keep it from burning; let it stew in its own gravy till the meat becomes tender; then take off all the fat from the top, mix some flour in two tablespoonfuls of water and pour it gradually into the stew; stir well and when it boils up good remove from the fire and serve.

FEMININE WIT.

In a recent burst of confidence young Benedict said that there was one thing about his wife that he didn't like. When pressed for an explanation he replied that it was her mother.

Dry-Goods Clerk (to young woman customer)—Ah! I believe I had the pleasure of meeting you at a garden party at Grimsby last summer. Young Woman—Will these goods wash, sir? Clerk—Yes, madam.

City Girl—"Are those great, strong cows over there yours, sir?" Farmer—"Yes, mum; and they are the strongest in this section." City Girl—"Then you must be the man that makes that awfully strong butter, ain't you?"

"How cool and delightful it is this morning, is it not, Cicely, dear?" she said as she burst into the boudoir of her friend. "Are you going to take a walk?" "No, I think not this morning. I am prejudiced against morning walks." "You didn't used to be when your fall suit was in style, you know." And there followed a chill that nothing short of a new suit will remove.

A young widow relates the sad accident which bereaved her of her dear partner in life: "We were on our way to Bagtinolles. A tram-car collided with our 'bus on the Boulevard de Clichy. A wheel came off. We were sitting outside. When they came to pick us up they found my husband crushed to death and my watch broken all to pieces." The lady then adds, pathetically: "And it was quite a new one!"

A woman was struck on the head by a large dishpan, which had been hung in such a place over the closet door that it could not be opened without dislodging the pan. Fortunately the injury was not serious, but with righteons indignation at the stupidity of her new Irish "help" she said: "Didn't you know the pan was sure to fall and likely to hurt someone badly if you hung it up there?" "Indade I did, maam. It fell on meself twicet to-day."

"Ah, those autumn leaves, Farmer Robinson," sighed his city guest. "What lovely tints of color, and what an addition they are to the charming scenery you must so enjoy." "Yes, miss. The leaves are gettin' a good deal of yaller and red onto 'em, that's a fact. It's about time to gather——" "Then you really find time to gather autumn leaves?" "Oh, yes, indeed. We rake up a few cart-loads every year for beddin' for the hosses." Another æsthetie dream smashed.

"That Parisian trick—the Vanishing Lady—that Hermann does is a great one," said Jones. "He covers a lady with a veil, and after a little manœuvering removes the veil, and the lady has disappeared." "That's nothing to a young lady in our boarding-house," answered Brown. "I have seen ten or twelve persons in the parlor, and this young lady come in, sit down to the piano, and begin to play and sing. In two minutes all the rest had disappeared. Talk about Hermann! He ain't a patch to her."

A bargain sign stopped a procession of vehicles in Tremont street, Boston, the other day, in an amusing way, opposite a noted dry-goods establishment. A woman whose weight could not have been less than three hundred, generous measure, rose slowly and majestically in her place in the street-car, and looked eagerly out of the window. The conductor marked the attitude and pulled the strap. The car came to a standstill, and the stout woman descended with much force on a feeble-looking passenger next her. "Don't you wish to get out?" cried the conductor in an irritated way. "Of course not. only wanted to see what that bargain in socks was."

Mitigating.

Parson (of the Baptist denomination): Brer Simpson, I'se s'prised fer ter see you goin' crabbin' dis beautiful Sunday mornin.'

Simpson: Er yaint goin' crabbin' sah; I'se been; en I was berry particular to ketch nuffin' but de hard shell ones, bein' it's de Sabbuf day—'deed I wuz, sah.

"The Three R's."

"What makes that little boy move so uneasily in his seat?" asked a visitor of the pretty schoolmistress.

"Oh, he is studying reading, writhing, and arithmetic, and he is practising writhing now."

He Was a Stranger.

"Do you put an 'e' in whisky here?" asked a new reporter of a Hamilton paper.

"No," replied the editor, who was slightly deaf; "we put nothing in whisky here. We take it straight."

"Do the Tudors live here?" "No, they live Tudors below here."

More than 100 000 copies of Gen. Lew Wallace's "Ben-Hur" have been sold. It probably would not have run as well if it had Ben Him.

FARM.

Feeding Young Animals.

All intelligent breeders and feeders admit the importance of getting a good start on young animals, says a writer in the Country Gentleman, no matter what the breed, and holding this, that the final results be up to the highest standard in growth and profit. Infants that eat freely of potatoes and other vegetables get large abdomens, and to the extent that this is true do they keep thin in the muscle and grow tardily. Such children suffer from cold when winter sets in and to a degree they are dwarfed by this feeding upon bulky, innutritious food. The stomach of the calf, the pig, and the colt are also small, and when these are distended by coarse food, they having to depend upon this after weaning, the belly gets big and growth of the body in a measure stops.

After frost has nipped the grass it will prove fatal to the health of the young things if they be made to depend upon this kind of food. Frosted grass has lost its nutritiousness, and that part which can be digested at all will be acted upon but slowly, fermentation will set in, the bulky stuff will pass through the intestinal canal tardily, and in this way we get the big abdomen. Upon this half-deadened fall feed the young things, both calves and colts, in connection with the big abdomen, are liable to become constipated, the bowels moving tardily and the fæces being impacted and dry. From the moment this condition sets in the flesh begins to shrink, and in place of the young animal being on the road to successful fitting for winter, it is traveling away from it.

When calves are found to be bloating up in the fall, having been changed from milk, and perhaps a ration of gruel twice daily, the bowels being costive as stated, the coarse dry food will become impacted in the third stomach, and in many cases no prompt and sufficient relief can be had until the hardened mass is diluted, which can only be done by using the pump provided for such cases. By pumping in an abundance of water the hardened mass becomes softened and will be encouraged to pass out, little by little, as it is softened and mixed with the water, which had better be used warm. By dissolving a quarter of a pound of epsom salts in the water a laxative effect may follow when the mass reaches the bowels.

Now, to escape all this is easy. How to do this? Simply by feeding concentrated nutritious food, seeing to it that the bulk is in keeping with the cavity into which it goes, leaving space therein for the stomach to act upon the contained mass, as in this way the damming up of the passage is prevented. A large proportion of nutriment must be contained in the given bulk of the food given to young animals of any species, as the natural tendency is to grow fast—this only being possible upon the use of food in every way calculated to meet the wants of the developing body. This must be easy of digestion and easy to be assimilated, else we get upon our hands that worst of all entailments in stock-growing—stunted growth.

Timely Suggestions.

An excellent feed for swine to begin the fattening process is cooked potatoes with buckwheat, whole or ground, thrown in while the potatoes are hot. After standing long enough to cool the mixture may be fed freely with no risk of cloying, provided a little care be exercised in the first few days to see that only as much is given as may be eaten clean.

A writer in the Dakota Farmer says that a few months since he visited a dairyman in New York, who had for years kept good common cows. Four years ago he bought a fine pure-bred Holstein bull and crossed upon his cows. Last year his two-year-old heifers gave double the quantity of milk his common cows did.

Knowing the benefit from harrowing spring grain after it came up we once tried the same plan on winter wheat in the fall. The result was not satisfactory. Undoubtedly the harrowing caused increased growth at the time, but it also made the soil more porous, and leveled the surface by breaking down the ridges made by the drill and which helped protect the grain. The wheat evidently winter-killed worse for the harrowing.

A large crop of potatoes takes from the soil nearly one hundred pounds of potash per acre. Few soils will stand this drain and therefore the yield declines. The potato crop is universally sold from the farm, and it leaves less refuse as manure than any other. Potato tops should be brought to the barnyard to be worked into the manure heap. Though not bulky they contain considerable fertilizing material. Left in the field they will be blown into fence corners in winter, and thus be lost.

Next spring many farmers will complain about their seed corn, because they will not select it at time of husking, or before. There is plenty now if it be saved properly. Pick up the best ears, strip the husks, except a few required for braiding then braid in strings and in a dry place where there is free circulation of air.

It is said that Fairhaven oysters have been damaged to the extent of $200,000 by the cold rains that fell in July. If oysters don't know enough to go in when it rains, they must expect to be damaged.

A recommendation—Dealer (pointing out beauties of a vicious looking animal with ears, back and hind leg suspiciously lifted): "There, sir, he's a beauty! Not another to touch him! You just ride him once, an' you'll never ride another." Little Tipkins, who is very nervous, thinks this is uncommonly likely, from the look of him.

At a certain house in Simcoe where a minister was boarding, the servant girl was anxious to anticipate everything in her work that any one wished her to do. She had always "just done it" or was "just doing it" when any order was given. This amused the young divine greatly, and one Monday morning he thought to nonplus the girl by a ruse. "I don't think Eliza has washed my Bible since I have been here," he said to the mistress, in a low tone, but designed to be overheard by the girl. "To-day is Monday, too." A few minutes later the mistress said to her in the presence of the clergyman: "Eliza, have you washed Mr. Blank's Bible?" "No, ma'am; but I've—I've got it aspak!"

RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

OVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER IX.

...BLE A TRAITOR AMONG THE SMUGGLERS?

...baleful look was in and about the ... of Dolan as he glanced from face to face ... crew, and in a low, deep voice, addressed them:

"I told you, my men, that the Spray you ...ponder was commissioned to hunt us ... but I did not tell why, exactly, and ...are the information that brought it ... the narrow sea, nor do I mean to tell ... now. If we can get clear away, I don't ...to make ill blood by telling you at all."

"Tell us at once," growled one of the ...

"No, Jackson—no. But I cannot help ... that we are in danger."

"Oh, we know that."

"I'm glad you do. But if yc go on, ...son, putting in your oar with ut being ... while I am speaking to: ie ship's ... any, I'll knock your lubber y brains ...

...kson looked indignant, but said no...

"As I was saying, then," continued Do... "we are in danger, though not exactly ...directly from the Spray, because we ...outsail her yet."

"Ay, ay," growled Ben Bowline.

"But when she chases us a little further ...shore—that we come to coast the cliffs of ...d England—she will signal to cross us to ...very craft she sees; and then we shall have ...e in both ways."

"Ay, ay," growled Ben, again.

"So my opinion is," added Dolan, "that ...ought to try and shake her off now, that ...e are in mid-channel."

The crew looked at each other dubiously.

"You know what I mean, all of you, as ...ll as if I had said it. You all know that ...we are taken without firing a shot, the ...most they can say of us is that we are ...gglers; but—but—" (here the baleful ...k about the eyes of Dolan deepened) "but if we as much as fire one shot against ...e king's ship—though it flew as wide of ...mark as west is from north—it's a yard-...m affair."

"We did fire one," growled Jackson.

"But if we did, you lubberly swab," said ...artin, "wasn't it in the fog—and who is ...to say or prove it came from us?"

"Oh, well!"

"Be quiet, will you, with your shore-...ing palaver?"

"What say you all?" added Dolan. "Would you rather be taken as smugglers ...an escape as—as—"

"Pirates!" cried Ben Bowline.

"Well, you may call it that, because ...ch is the name they will give to it. In ...e one case, you will be put in prison for ...elve months or so, and then be drafted ...board a frigate. In the other, you will ...et clear off; and as this is to be the last ...venture in these waters, why, I am for risk...g all, and making a fight for it. What ...y you? Are you fond of imprisonment, ...d then being carried in handcuffs for five ...ears before the mast of a frigate? If you ...like them, say so; but if you are men—if ...u want to keep your little hoards that ...u have all saved—if you want to lead free ...ves and merry ones—"

Captain Dolan only got thus far in his ...ration when he was stopped by a ringing ...eer from his men: and then a noisy de...mination to fight the schooner.

"Well," he said, "that's man-like. Now, ...ind you, I don't want to fight quarter to ...arter—that's not the thing; but I do ...ant to cripple the Spray so that she may ...e us alone—and as soon as she lets us ...one, we will let her alone."

"Ay, ay," shouted the crew.

Captain Dolan had stated that the night ...as coming; but from the sudden darkness ...hat now crept over the scene, it would ap...ear that it had been much nearer at hand ...han he had assumed it to be.

A bank of dense clouds slowly crept over ...he sky from the southeast and the water ...ooked black as ink. The wind came in in...ensely cold puffs: and now and then a ...ight shower of half rain, half sleet, be...okened the approach of what sailors call a ..."dirty night."

The white sails of the Spray could be dis...inctly enough still seen—for she was not ...ore three-quarters of a mile astern of the ...ift: and now the government vessel began ...o fire rockets in couples into the night air, ...hich gave Dolan and the crew of the Rift ...good deal of uneasiness—they had so much ...he character of signals to some force that ...ight be in shore and which might prove so ...ery hazardous to the Rift.

Dolan now held a brief consultation with Martin and Ben Bowline; and then, in a ...oud, clear voice, he cried:

"Clear her out—'Number Twelve'—clear ...er out, my men, and we will give the Spray ...a little taste of our quality!"

"Number Twelve," as it was called, was a long gun that would carry a twelve-pound shot with great precision and for a great distance. It was of Spanish manufacture and had been purchased by Dolan at Cadiz. Once only in the history of the Rift had it been found or considered necessary to fire this piece of ordnance—and then it had been the means of freeing her from great danger of capture.

It was with the grim looks of men who are facing a great danger, but have made up their minds to do so, that the crew of the Rift prepared to fight the Spray; for well they knew that the words of Dolan were true, and that one shot fired on the king's ship subjected them to the punishment of pirates.

By the faint strange light of the evening that still gleamed at intervals from beneath the towering clouds, the ship had a special kind of look, and the faces of the crew seem...ed paler than usual. The wind hissed and sighed through the stout rigging of the cut...er: and rolling and foaming in the trough ...f the sea, they could see the schooner, with every inch of canvas they could carry, in full pursuit.

"Hand over hand she comes!" cried Martin.

"Let her come!" growled Ben Bowline. "Will Dolan fire the gun?"

"Yes—he or his master."

"Who's his master? What do you mean?"

Martin significantly pointed below; and then Dolan cried out loudly:

"Martin to the helm! Keep a bright lookout and dodge the shot. There she goes it again."

Flash came a stream of light from the side of the schooner; and, then with a sharp clap, came the report of the gun, and the cutter heaved heavily in the sea, as the shot again passed her in most dangerous proximity.

The crew had been busy with "Number Twelve," as the long corronade was called, and its dark muzzle now pointed threateningly toward the Spray.

"All ready?" asked Nolan.

"Ay, ay, sir; all ready."

Then, my men, I have something to tell you before the gun does, I hope, its work for us."

He sprang upon a portion of the gun-carriage as he spoke, and in the singular night-light that was about and upon him, Dolan looked perfectly fiend-like.

"You all think it something out of the way that the government should commission a schooner on purpose to hunt us down, but there is a reason in all things. We have been betrayed!"

There was a visible commotion among the crew.

"Yes, betrayed! But before I ask you to think of this,—before I ask you to act upon it—and before I tell you who the traitor is—I have one request to make of you, one and all."

"What is it?" said Jackson.

"It is, that you will spare the life of the traitor—it is, that you will let him be to what punishment may overtake him for his treachery—it is, that you will make him, and him only, fire this gun; so that, come what may, he will be committed to the act."

A general shout of acquiescence to this proposition, or rather to these several propositions, followed Dolan's speech; and then waving his arms for silence, he added:

"Very well! We will understand each other and I will read you a letter."

Bang! went another gun from the Spray and a portion of the ornamental bulwark that had been placed at the stern of the Rift by way of disguising her was torn away, a splinter from it grazing the cheek of Dolan and inflicting a slight wound, but still one from which the blood started in a row of drops like red rain.

"Only a touch," he said, "only a touch. It is part of the whole affair. You shall hear, shipmates—you shall hear who it is that I have to thank for this."

There was a wild, unnatural, sneering tone in the latter portion of these words, and then, holding before his eyes the paper he had taken from his pocket, but evidently at the same time repeating the words he uttered either from memory or concocting them at the moment, he spoke as follows, while you might, to use a popular expression, have heard a pin drop on board the Rift:

"TO SIR THOMAS CLIFFORD, PORT ADMIRAL; FALMOUTH:

"SIR THOMAS—If you wish to put an end, once and for all, to the worst gang of smugglers on this coast, you will look out for a cutter named the Rift. It is very crank built and its mast rakes out of all custom. There is a secret about the matter in which it embays itself that I will not disclose, as it might endanger the safety of one I wish to preserve; but if you choose to take the Rift in the open channel, you may find her on the fifteenth of this month anywhere between Falmouth and the French coast. Keep my name a secret. I will call on you after you have captured the Rift."

Probably to any persons but sailors, who have so little to do with letters and who know so little of their ordinary style, or of shore life, this pretended epistle would at once, on its surface, have presented ample evidences of concoction for sinister purposes; but to the crew of the Rift it appeared a diabolical production, expressly written and planned for their ruin and quite sufficient to account for the presence of the Spray in their wake.

A groan of execration at the writer, be he whom he might, burst from every throat; and then one cried out, gruffly:

"Tell us who it is, Captain Dolan; and I'll for one, lend a hand to pitch him overboard,"

"No," said Dolan; "you forget. You promised me; all of you, that such was not to be the case—that you would let him alone."

"Ay, ay, so we did."

"Will you keep that promise?"

"We will—we will."

"And will you make him fire the gun at the Spray?"

"We will—we will."

"Then, shipmates, I will read you the name at the foot of this letter which was intended to be the destruction of us all. The name at the foot of the letter is—is—now what, think you?"

"Oh, be bothered," growled Jackson. "Tell us at once, do, and make an end of it."

Bang! came the report of another gun from the Spray, but Martin succeeded in changing the course of the cutter so quickly the ball only grazed her side and fell harmlessly in the sea.

"The conclusion of the letter, then, is in these words:

"I beg to remain, Sir Thomas Clifford, your obedient servent, GERALD DOLAN.'"

A yell burst from the crew and a half kind of rush was made for the cabin where Gerald was known to be.

"Now," added Captian Dolan, as he pretended to pass the back of hand over his eyes, as though he were very much affected by having thus to accuse his own son—"now you know all and why I got the promise from you to spare his life. You know all now."

"Overboard with him! The Jonah! Kill him! Brain him! Fasten him to the gun and send him off to the Spray!"

Such were the shouts that arose from the infuriated crew; but Dolan placed himself by the hatchway, as he said:

"No, no! he is my son still."

"Down with him to Davy Jones's locker!" shouted Jackson. "Only let me get at him!"

"No! no! You shall all keep your promise, and when we get back to the cavern in the cliff—which we shall get back to if you are all true to me and true to yourselves—then we can think of what to do with him; but, at present, we will make him fire on the Spray, which his own letter has sent in pursuit or us, and which has brought this blood upon my cheek and would blow us all out of the water, if it could."

"But, Captain Dolan," said Ben Bowline with a puzzled look, "may I ask one thing?"

"Certainly, Ben."

"Well captain, and you, messmates! how comes it, if this here letter, villainous as it is, was sent to Admiral Sir Thomas Clifford, that our own skipper here Captain Dolan, has got it?"

Dolan looked staggered for a moment, and one of the crew, as he put into his cheek an enormous extra lump of tobacco, said:

"My eye! but that Ben is an out-and-out sea lawyer. I never thought of that now,"

"How comes it that I have the letter addressed to Admiral Sir Thomas Clifford?" said Dolan.

"Ay, ay, sir; that's it."

"Why, it's a copy of it. It says at the top of it: 'A copy of a letter that I sent to Sir Thomas Clifford about the Rift.'"

A groan came from the crew.

"Does it?" said Ben.

"It does."

"It will settle the matter, Captain Dolan, if I reads that ere bit of it to the crew."

"Ay, ay—Ben read it—Ben read it."

"My eye!" said the sailor, who had before expressed his admiration of Bowline—"If that Ben oughtent to be the—that's his name—the Lord High Admiral Chancellor."

"Take it, Ben. Take it," said Dolan, as he stretched out his hand and let go the paper before Ben could reach it; and the wind taking it, whirled it at once far away to sea, where no mortal eyes would ever look upon it again.

"Oh!" said Ben, "that's unlucky."

"How provoking!" said Dolan. "I thought you had hold of it."

"Oh, dear, no!"

Dolan suspected that the "oh, dear, no!" was a contradiction to his statement of what he thought; but he affected to take it in its other sense—namely, that Benhad not got hold of the paper.

"Well," he said, "it can't be helped now. It's gone; but, just as I read it to you, my men, there it was, as this blood now trickling down my cheek can testify."

Now the blood upon the cheek of Captain Dolan did not testify to anything of the sort; but there was the material blood, and the thing sounded like an argument, and to the illogical sailors it was received as such. There is many an affected truth—and many a hoary inquiry, in this world, that is supported upon no sounder a logical basis than was involved in this statement on the part of Captain Dolan!

Alas, poor Gerald! Danger thickens about him.

What is it that he is beloved and caressed by those who know his worth and his true nobility of soul, if that band of desperadoes, on board the Rift, believe him to be their mortal foe and treacherous enemy? What now can save him?

"Make him fire the gun," said Captain Dolan. "He shall fire the gun!"

"He shall! he shall!" shouted the crew; and they made a rush toward the cabin where Gerald was a prisoner.

CHAPTER X.

CAPTAIN MORTON MAKES AN UNEXPECTED DISCOVERY.

We left Captain Morton, of the American yacht Nautilus, about to take his way down the narrow turning that led to the sea, near to the town of Falmouth.

It seemed to him as if, from the first moment that he had lauded on the shores of England, he had been surrounded by mysterious influences which had directed his movements, and with a feeling at his heart—that heart so burdened with sorrow—he believed that yet before he closed his eyes that night in sleep he should hear or discover something on the subject whi h now, for ten years past, had engaged all his waking and much of his sleeping thoughts.

The turning was very narrow, and on the little plateau, or slope on either side of it, coarse shrubs and some of the wildest of wild flowers had grown.

From the top two slips of chalk and loam had partially taken place, bringing with them the huge, gnarled roots of old trees, from which spurious suckers had shot forth with a strange luxuriance.

The place was dark, in some portions of it, as a cavern, and it was not until Captain Morton actually came within sight of the sea that he could persuade himself the narrow, tortuous turning actually led to it and to the beach.

It was now just that period of the evening when all the dim clouds had piled themselves up from the southeast and the slant, cold rain began to fall.

Captain Morton paid no attention whatever to the state of the weather. The probability is that he was scarcely aware of it at all. Once or twice he felt in his waistcoat pocket for the fragment of a newspaper that seemed to be the most precious object in his possession.

And now he has nearly reached the beach. A few wretched fishermen's huts are there, and one in particular, which is made entirely from about half a large boat set up on end on the middle, and patched up in front, so as to look like an eccentric house.

From the windows of this boat residence, or from what served as windows—being openings over which oiled paper was pasted—there gleamed a faint, uncertain light; and Captain Morton thought that he heard some one reading or praying within the boat-house.

The captain drew closer to the singular residence, and then he heard some one cry out:

"No—no—I tell you no! I never did that. They did it—oh, heaven knows; for it used to look down on us with its million eyes—the stars they are. Heaven knows that they did it, but I did not—I did not! Oh, have mercy! Oh, do have mercy!"

Captain Morton paused and listened.

"Let me die in peace—in peace! Go away!—go away! I tell you to go away, all of you—all of you!"

A succession of deep groans then came from some one apparently in great agony, and then all was still.

Captain Morton tapped at the door of the boat-house.

"No, no!" screamed the same voice that had before spoken. "No—no more—no more. Why do you come to me! I did not kill them; I saw it done; but I did not kill them! Go away! Go away!"

The captain tapped at the door again; but this time no notice was taken, and he felt for some mode of opening it, but there was none.

The shadow of some one passing close at hand seemed for a moment to deepen the gloom of the spot and Captain Morton called out aloud:

"Hilloa! Who goes there?"

A man in the garb of a fisherman lounged forward.

"Does your honor want a boat?"

"A boat?—no. Tell me who it is that resides here?"

"In the old boat, your honor?"

"Yes, yes."

"Oh, that's old Simms."

"But he's very ill; perhaps dying."

"Lord bless your honor—no. That's his way. We don't mind him. He has had a tap on the head, we all think, in some smuggling affair, and he don't seem to be quite right in his wits. He lives here, but nobody knows very well how—though they do say he gets kept by the runners."

"The who?"

"Oh, the lads that run a cargo now and then without asking leave of the custom house."

"Oh, the smugglers!"

"You may call them that, sir. And if a plain man may say a plain thing I would just advise you, as you are a new one and a raw one, to keep a whole skin and go home; that's all I'd say to you!"

"A new one and a raw one? I don't understand you. I am captain and owner of the Nautilus, out yonder."

"What? that tidy little craft with the 'Merican flag?"

"The same."

"Then, I beg your pardon, sir. I thought you was a custom house officer on the spy."

A startling yell at this moment from within the boat-house testified to the fact that old Simms, as the fishermen called him, had by no means finished his alarms for the night.

"Well," said the fisherman, "he do seem a bit worse nor usual, sir. Hilloa! hilloa! Simms, ahoy! Hilloa!"

"Keep them away; I don't like to see them, with all their drowned faces, keep them away, will you?"

"There he goes; you see, sir. He belonged to the runners about St. Just's Bay."

"St. Just's?"

"Yes, your honor; and at times he seems to dream about things it would be all as well he could forget."

"Perhaps not—perhaps not. I should like to speak to him. Can I get into his hovel?"

"Not a bit of it, your honor. He shuts himself up pretty safe, unless one chooses to break in, and that would be easy enough."

"So I should think," said Captain Morton, as he set his shoulder to the frail door, and with a crash it fell inward. "That will do."

Calmly and collectedly, to all outward appearance, Captain Morton entered the dwelling of old Simms; and by the light of a cotton wick, that just projected from the spout of an earthen pan of coarse fish oil, he saw, lying on a miserable trundle bed, an old man, whose bloodshot, staring eyes were fixed on vacancy. He did not seem to have observed the entrance of Captain Morton, or to have noticed he breaking down of his door; bnt with...t, lips rapidly moving, he seemed to be comm...ing in agitated w hispers with a something that no one saw but himself.

"Go away—go away— ...y!" was what he kept on saying, and each time that he uttered the words they seemed to increase in agony of expression.

Captain Morton advanced close to the bedside and placed his hand on the wrist of the old man, saying, with a deep, solemn voice:

"Simms, I want to question you about St. Just's Bay."

The old man uttered a scream and started up in his bed and looked wildly at the captain.

"You—you—you are not—not—"

"Not what?"

"The—no, no—not like you! Oh, what a soul—what a soul! Hush, hush! Were you on board?"

"On board what?"

"The Sarah Ann."

How the Thistle Travels.

There is no weed weedier or more ubiquitous than the common thistle. In paradise, it is true, if we may trust John Milton there were no thorns or thistles; the creation and introduction of the noxious trib upon this once innocent and thornless earth being a direct consequence of the fall of man and a stern retribution for Adam's delinquency. But since then the thistle has managed so to diffuse itself over the habitable globe that there hardly now remains a spot on earth without its own local representative of that ever-intrusive and conquering genus. Wherever civilized man goes, there the thistle accompanies him as a matter of course in his various wanderings. It adapts itself to all earthly environments. Close up to the Arctic Circle you find it defying the indigenous reindeer with its prickly wings; under an equatorial sky you may observe it accommodating itself most complacently with a sardonic smile to tropical existence, and battling with the prickly cactuses and the thorny acacias, to the manner born, for its fair share of the dry and arid uplands. Even nettles are nowhere in competition with it; in spite of its valuable and irritating sting, the nettle has not the plasticity and adaptability of constitution that mark the stout and sturdy thistle tribe. Garnered and harvested yearly with the farmer's corn, its seeds have been gratuitously distributed by its cadgy man, in all climates; and wherever it gains the slightest foothold, its winged down enables it to diffuse itself ad nifinitum through the virgin soil of yet unconquered and unthistly continents. A field of thistles in England itself is a beautiful sight for the enthusiastic botanist (who has usually a low opinion of the agricultural interest); but in the fresh and fallow earth of New Zealand they attain a yet more prodigious and portentous stature, that might well strike awe and dismay into the stout heart of a Berkshire farmer.

The fact is, the thistle is one of those bellicose plants which specially lay themselves out, in the struggle for existence, for the occupation of soils where they are compelled to defend their leaves and stems from the constant attacks of the larger herbivores. On open plains and wide steppes, much browsed over in the wild state by deer or buffalo, and in the degenerate civilized condition by more prosaic cows and donkeys, one may always note that only the prickliest and most defensive plants have any chance of gaining a livelihood.

Gerard, the Lion Hunter's Pet.

The story is told of Gerard, the great lion-hunter, that he captured a whelp in the mountains of Jebel-Mezours, Algiers, named it "Hubert," and brought it up as he would bring up a dog from puppyhood. After some time, his huge pet becoming too dangerous to go at large, Gerard made a present of the animal to his friend, the Duc d'Aumale, and Hubert traveled to Paris in a big cage, bemoaning his separation from his old master. The next year Gerard himself visited Paris on leave of absence from the army, and went at once to the Jardin des Plantes to see his exiled favorite. He describes the interview as follows:

Hubert was lying down, half asleep, regarding at intervals with half shut eyes the persons who were passing and repassing before him. All of a sudden he raised his head, his tail moved, his eyes dilated, a nervous motion contracted the muscles of his face. He had seen the uniform of the Spahis, but had not yet recognized his friend. I drew nearer and nearer, and no longer able to restrain my emotion I stretched my hand out to him through the bars.

Without ceasing his earnest gaze he applied his nose to my hand and drew in knowledge with a long breath. At each inhalation his attitude became more noble, his look more satisfied and affectionate. Under the uniform that had been so dear to him he began to recognize the friend of his heart.

I felt that it only needed a single word to dissipate all doubt.

"Hubert!" I said, as I laid my hand on him—"my old soldier!"

Not another word. With a furious bound and a note of welcome he sprang against the iron bars, that bent and trembled with the blow. My friends fled in terror, calling on me to do the same. Noble animal! You made the world tremble even in your ecstacies of pleasure.

Hubert was standing with his cheek against the grating, attempting to break down the obstacle that separated us, magnificent to behold as he shook the walls of the building with his roars of joy and anger. His enormous tongue licked the hand that I abandoned to his caresses, while with his paws he gently tried to draw me to him. If any one tried to come near he fell into frenzies of rage, and when the visitors fell back to a distance he became calm and caressing as before, handling me with his huge paws, rubbing against the bars, and licking my hand, while every gesture and moan and look told of his joy and his love.

When I turned to leave him he shook the gallery with his heart-rending roars; and it was not till I had gone back to him twenty times, and tried to make him understand that I would come again, that I succeeded in quitting the place.

After that I came to see my friend daily, sometimes spending several hours with him in his cage. But after a while I noticed that he became sad and dispirited, and when the keepers alluded to his furious agitation and excitement every time I left him, and attributed his worn-out and changed appearance to this cause, I took their advice and made my visits as seldom as possible. One day, some four month from the time of my first meeting with him in Paris, I entered the garden, and one of the keepers came forward, saluting, and said: "Don't come any more, sir. Hubert is dead."

The Language of Monkeys.

In the way of language, monkeys manifest their passions, emotions, desires, and fears, by cries and gestures, emphasized by significant accents, which vary with the species. Monkeys and children, together with savages and uneducated people of civilized nations, manifest an inclination to mimic the gestures and motions of all persons whom they see. We think that this trait is especially prominent in monkeys, but thousands of instances might be cited to show that mankind, old and young, shares it with them. The attitude and the sagacity of monkeys are so human that some savages believe that it is out of maliciousness that they do not talk. In fact, a monkey might pass for a dumb man, because he does not articulate the consonants clearly, as we do; but not all men have this power of articulation in an equal degree. We have stammerers by birth and by habit. Some savage tribes have a scanty alphabet complicated by clicks and nasal and guttural sounds that can not be imagined till they are heard. All monkeys have voices, and many of them have very strong ones. Excepting the solitary and taciturn orang-ontang, the species which live in troops are chatterers, and keep up a great hubbub. The principal notes of their noisy and rapid language, with the frequent repetitions of the same sounds, may also be found in the languages of the most savage peoples. They are, for the most part, complex, guttural, and harsh articulations, with few variations. But the alphabets of some of the African and Melanesian nations are not much richer. In both, it is generally the labials which are wanting. Laughter is not wholly peculiar to men, for some monkeys have a noisy and expansive laugh analogous to ours. Cook has stated that natives of the New Hebrides express their joy by a kind of guttural whistle, analogous to the jerky, rattling laugh of some monkeys. Monkeys are also capable of showing sorrow and weeping; and it is possible to follow on their faces the equivalents of the physiognomical changes which in man answer to the expression of his various emotions. Among these are the drawing back of the corners of the mouth and the contraction of the lower eyelid, which constitute the monkey's smile, and the depression of the eyebrow and forehead in anger.

Dr. N. Washington, Throat and Lung Surgeon, Toronto and Halifax:
DEAR SIR,—I am pleased to express my extreme satisfaction at the results of your "NEW METHOD" of Inhalation which has cured me of Catarrh of a very troublesome character; in fact all the usual remedies failed to give me any relief, but your Treatment, from the first, gave great ease, and in a few months entirely cured me of a most annoying disease. I can honestly recommend any who may be suffering as I was to your skilful consideration.
Yours truly,

MR. JOHN I GRAHAM of Artemesia will please accept thanks for a bag of beautiful apples of the Northern Spy, King of Tompkins and pippin varieties: One of the first named, measures 12 inches in circumference, being the largest we have ever seen of that variety. Mr. Graham has taken over 40 first prizes this fall on his apples, and may justly take a front seat as a fruit raiser. His farm is admirably situated for irigation, being on the side of the mountain with a beautiful spring of water at the upper end from which he irrigates the orchard, as well as pasture meadows and grain crops during dry weather which gives him a decided advantage over his brother farmers.

THE Methodist S. S. Anniversary service last Sunday were very successful. The attendance of parents was below par in the morning, showing either a want of interest, or a weakness for Sunday morning sleeping. The sermon in the morning was specially for children, and very appropriate, while the evening discourse "The wise woman builder" was an earnest practical sermon and listened to with great attention by a large audience. Callections for the day $11.49 for the benefit of the School. The entertainment on Monday evening was not largely attended, doubtless owing to the Sir John demonstration and excursion to Owen Sound which took fully one half the ratepayers of the village away. The program went off very nicely, showing that good drilling had been enforced. Many of the pieces were quite difficult, yet carried through with ability. The report showed the school to be in a healthy and prosperous condition and a zealous staff of teachers and officers.

Blain Against Euphrasia.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

SIR,—In the Flesherton Advance of November 4th, I notice an article under the above heading signed. "One who was there." Seeing that I have somewhat intimate acquaintance with the matter refered to in the article and have been charged with a breach of good faith, in making public a letter written to me by Dr. Christoe, and also with concealing facts from the council of Artemesia at the time the work was in progress, you will kindly allow me space in your paper to give my version of the matter and put myself fairly before the public. I have no intention of placing responsibilities on the shoulders of any man that ought not to be there, neither do I wish to evade responsibilities that rightfully belong to myself.

In the month of June 1877 application was made to the Township Council of Euphrasia by Wm. Douglas and the late Mark Armstrong of Markdale for a grant of money to repair Nelson's hill on the townline between Euphrasia and Artemesia, I need hardly say that the hill was then, and had been for some time previously, unsafe for public travel. The Council of Euphrasia passed a resolution authorizing the Reeve, Mr. Robert Myles, to have the hill repaired provided the Council of Artemesia would co-operate with Euphrasia. The motion was an open motion no sum being mentioned.

A certified copy of the resolution was placed in my hands by Messrs Douglas and Armstrong, with a request that I would present it to the Artemesia Council at their meeting on the first Monday in August and urge co-operation with Euphrasia. I presented the resolution and made a motion to the effect that Artemesia co-operate with Euphrasia, the motion was lost Dr. Christoe voting against it.

At the September meeting of Artemesia council the Reeve of Euphrasia was present and urged the necessity of doing the repairs on the hill. Artemesia again refused, on this occasion both Reeves lost their tempers over the matter and some bretty strong language was indulged in. The reasons given by Dr. Christoe for not doing the work was, lateness of the season, state of the weather, and want of funds. It should be borne in mind that application was first made to Artemesia on the first of August, not a bad season of the year to cut down a gravel hill, and surely three or four months would be ample time in which to do a four hundred dollar job. I am strongly of the opinion that the plea's set up were all moonshine. The real reason must be looked for somewhere else, and I think it would not be hard to find them.

Some time in September, (if my memory serves me right) the most important event perhaps, in connection with the whole matter occured, certainly the event which gave it notoriety I mean the birth of what Dr. Christoe calls "the notorions letter" the circumstances attending the accouchment of its parent are peculiar. The Dr. met a prominent inhabitant of Markdale who put things in a new light to him, who urged as to the expediency of doing it at once, accordingly, the notorious letter so much discussed, had it's birth, intended and written as a private letter to the then Deputy Reeve of Artemesia, Stating the facts and pledging his support in council for a grant of $100, if the Euphrasia people still desired to go on. Nothing was heard of the matter for some months. This is where the shoe pinches, if the Dr. at the time he wrote the letter, really intended it to be, a private letter, surely he would have put some mark upon it, that would indicate his intentions, but there was no such mark. The letter was a public letter, written by one public man to another, and signed 'Dr. Christoe, Reeve," and was considered as such to myself when I received it, when the letter was put in the Dr's hands at the trial, he swore it was a private letter, he also swore that he did not sign the letter as "Reeve," but failed to establish the point. It will thus be seen that there was no breach of good faith on my part.

But there was circumstances connected with the birth of the letter that had a somewhat shady appearance. Who is the prominent inhabitant? What argument did he use, that had such a wonderful effect upon the Dr's mind? Did he apply the lash vigorously? I have been told that he did. Certainly the Dr. responded promptly, for I received the letter by the first mail following the application of the prominent inhabitant's whip. It appears there was two prominent inhabitants of Markdale on board the T. G. & B. by train that night, both heavy men, now wonder the Dr. was forced to strike his colours, the presure was great.

This matter first came before the Artemesia Council, on the first August, again on the first September, the letter was written in September, and I think the job was let in the latter part of September, however at the first meeting of council after the job was let, I told the council verbaly that it was let, the price per yard at which it was let, and the name of the contractor. There was nothing more said about it until it was finished. Where was the concealment except in the Dr's. imagination, and when does he get his "some months"?

"Mr. Elliott at our council board repudiated any action on his part in comprising Artemesia; but at the court in Owen Sound he testified at being present at the letting of the work, and that he acted as an Inspector with authority from Myles to grant certificates on Euphrasia for interim payments." True I was present at the letting of the work, and said that I did not represent Artemesia. It was proved by a witness summoned by Blain that I said so. I told Blain before he bid on the job that I did not represent Artemesia and that I would not be responsible for payment of any part of the contract price. Myles asked me to oversee the work as it progressed and made arrangements with Blain to give him advances on acct. on certificates signed by me. Myles never asked me if I represented Artemesia, he had seen the Dr's. letter and I suppose took it for granted that the Reeve of Artemesia would carry out his pledges. But it appears it was a case of misplaced confidence. The Dr's statements lack accuracy, no sum of money is menticned in the letter, the words used are, "a grant," he says the Jury gave a verdict for Blain, I think not, there was a Jury impaneled, and the evidence taken but the case was not given to them. There was no verdict. The Judge gave a decision in favor of Blain, simply to stay proceedings until the technical points raised could be argued in Chambers, when the decision was reversed, I quote again, "But it was also clearly seen, that Euphrasia ignored the action of her Reeve. The poor man had to suffer for Myles' wrong doing." What are the facts? Euphrasia promptly paid one half of the contract price, and after service but before the trial, the Reeve offered to pay Blain the balance of the contract, if Blain would pay the cost then incurred. It was supposed the cost at the time would not exceed $12 or $14, Blain although urged by myself to accept the offer refused; Who then is to blame for his suffering. Where is the repudiation?

Previous to the completion of the work and for some time after Artemesia, made no formal offer of any sum. I appeal to the records, neither did she offer $100, on the grounds that Euphrasia derived the largest benefit from the work. If there is any documentary evidence that she did, and if the Dr. will produce it I shall be pleased to make corrections as far as my own personal liability is concerned if there was liability. It is a matter with which the public have little to do, and I suppose take just as little interest in it.

I think no intelligent business men will deny that the road being unsafe for public travel, it was the duty of the Municipal Councils interested, with as little delay as possible, to put the road in such an efficient state of repair that the public could pass over it without danger of accident. As soon as the matter was brought before the notice of the Euphrasia council they promptly took action. Artemesia just as promptly refused to do so, and apparently was prepared to take the chanches of having to pay heavy damages in the event of an accident occuring on the hill. It is easy for an individual or corporation to trump up reasons for doing, or not doing a particular thing, but the question is, are the reasons given sufficient under the circumstances to warrant the course taken. I think not.

HOUSEHOLD.

Kitchen Gossips.

Silver that is not in frequent use will not tarnish if rubbed in oatmeal.

Whole cloves are now used to exterminate the merciless and industrious moth. It is said they are more effectual as a destroying agent than either tobacco, camphor or cedar shavings.

To Keep Insects Out of Bird Cages.—Tie up a little sulphur in a bag and suspend it in the cage. Red ants, it is said, will never be found in a closet or drawer if a small bag of sulphur be kept in these places.

To Remove Clinkers.—To remove clinkers from the stove, sprinkle common table salt on the linings when the stove is cold. Use plenty of it. Build a moderate fire—wood and coal—and in a day or two the clinkers will be gone.

How to Preserve Eggs.—To each pailful of water, add two pints of fresh slacked lime and one pint of common salt; mix well. Fill your barrel half full with this fluid, put your eggs down in it any time after June, and they will keep two years if desired.

The Treatment of Whooping-cough with Illuminating Gas.—Dr. W. T. Greene suggests an easily available improvement on the old plan of sending children on visits to the gas-works. His plan is to attach a piece of rubber tubing to a burner, the tubing being long enough to reach the floor. The gas is turned on just enough to make a perceptible odor, and the child is to inhale it for a few minutes at a time as often as convenient.

A Good Gruel.—For a sick man's gruel, take our common grits and wash thoroughly. In cooking, use an excess of water, and cook until perfectly soft, pouring off and straining the liquor, which should be salted to the taste. The more water you use, the lighter in body the gruel. If it is desired to make it richer, add about one-half milk; and here you have a splendid gruel for delicate persons and for convalescents. Use the grits from Southern grown corn.

To Restore Injured Meat.—When the brine sours or taints the meat, pour it off, skim it well, then pour it back again on the meat, boiling hot; this will restore it even when much injured. If tainted meat is immersed in the solution of chloride of lime prescribed for rancid butter, it will restore it. Fresh meat, hams, fish, etc., can be preserved for an indefinite length of time without salt, by a light application of pyroligneous acid applied with a brush; it imparts a fine, smoky flavor to the meat, and is an effectual preservative against its loss.

Sulphur Fumes for Consumption.—consumptive patients are advised by a pupil of Liebig, in the Apotheke Verein, to live in rooms where one or two drachms of sulphur are melted on a hot stove. The first ten days brings increased cough and irritation, then these cease, and the patient improves rapidly. Persons with catarrh and in early stages of consumption apply to enter chemical factories, where large quantities of sulphur are evaporated daily, and are cured in a few weeks by the inhalations. Cholera and epidemic diseases are never found in such factories.

German Sauce.—One gallon of green tomatoes chopped fine, one quart of celery and one quart of onions, both chopped fine, two gills of white mustard seed, one of ground black pepper, one gill whole allspice, one gill whole cloves, three gills salt, one pound of white sugar, three quarts of good cider vinegar, one gallon chopped cabbage. Put the cabbage and tomatoes under pressure over night, and in the morning add two red peppers chopped fine. Mix all except the spices together and boil until quite tender, stirring often. When done add the spices, stir well and put into your jars.

Origin of Fruit Canning.—It is a singular fact that we are indebted to Pompeii for the great industry of canning fruit. Years ago, when the excavations were just beginning, a party of Cincinnatians found in what had been the pantry of a house many jars of preserved figs. One was opened and they were found to be fresh and good. Investigations showed that the figs had been put into jars in a heated state, an aperture left for the steam to escape, and then sealed with wax. The hint was taken, and the next year canning fruit was introduced into the United States, the process being identical with that in vogue in Pompeii twenty centuries ago. The old ladies in Canada who can tomatoes and peaches do not realize that they are indebted for this art to a people who perished nearly 2,000 years ago.

For Spare Minutes.

A Pretty Bedspread.—Get an oblong piece of plain Congress canvass for the centre. Put an inch-wide hem all around it. Then make a border of the striped scrym, upon the four sides, and run bright ribbon in it, which can be taken out when washed. A broad lace around the edge will be very handsome, though a wide hem is a pretty finish.

A Cloth Cleaner.—Roll a straight strip of black cloth about four inches wide, over and over very tightly, until you have a roll about as thick as a broomstick and as long as the strip is wide. Cut off the extra cloth and sew the roll firmly down the side. Trim the ends evenly with sharp scissors. If intended for a present, work the name of the donee upon it.

A Muslin Toilet-set.—Cut out squares of Swiss muslin, or circles if liked better, for mats, and also a covering for the cushion. In the centre of each etch a flower or a letter. Cover the cushion first with a white silesia, putting the shiny side out, then put on the muslin. Do the same thing for the mats. Now cut long strips of white muslin, two inches wide. Whip both edges with blue, then plait it up through the centre and sew around the cushion and the edges of the mats. These strips need to be just three times the length of the cushion or mat it is to go around.

A Circus Rug.—Directions for making this rug for the little ones are taken from Babyhood: Form gray canton flannel into a six-foot square. Cut paper patterns (in outline) of all the animals you can—as the cat, dog, elephant, rat, cow, horse, frog, rabbit, squirrel. Then cut them from colored flannel, carefully choosing assorted colors—as yellow, blue, red, white and brown. Use button-hole stitch to fasten these impossible-looking animals on the canton flannel. A few stitches with black or white cotton will form features, and help to define the body and supply the shading. This is so nice for baby to kick on that it will repay for the trouble of making it.

For a Fair.—Buy a couple of pounds of English walnuts and use the meats for home-made candy, taking care to preserve the shell in "whole halves" during the cracking process. Then write out personal remarks from the poets, easily selected from birthday books, enough so that each buyer will find a complimentary allusion to himself inside the walnut. Place the sentiment between the shells and fasten them together on one side with glue or by running a blue ribbon through holes in each half, which have been made with a hot knitting needle. Bronze over the shells, and the dish of "complements" is attractive in appearance and bound to net several hundred per cent. on first cost, labor of course counting as nothing.

A bag of silk pieces, old and new, has been accumulating for several months; bits of ribbon, silk linings, odds and ends left from the "crazing quilt," even the silk of a brown umbrella, every conceivable color and shade. These all may be cut into strips, half an inch wide, and sewed together at random, so as to color in one long piece, and wound, forming a large ball. This sewing can be done, either by hand or machine; in the latter case, cut the stripes after sewing. Now cast from the silk forty stitches upon medium size tidy needles and knit, in loose, plain stitch, back and forth. The blending of colors will be found very pleasing, the work rapid and fascinating, and the result most satisfactory. The pieces can be knitted of any desired size, and be applied to numberless uses and ways of ornamenting. A friend has used long strips of this knitted material by alternating them with the same width of satin for window curtains, and they were beautiful. It also made a very handsome piano scarf, the ends finished with a heavy, mixed, silk fringe.

Weather Pro hets.

A few weeks ago, after the terrible earthquake that wrecked Charleston, a Canadian "professor," who had previously drawn attention to himself by predictions of great storms, which did not make their appearance at the appointed time, frightened the already terror-stricken people of Charleston and its vicinity by announcing that on a fixed day there would be an earthquake still more fearful than any which had taken place.

Every one knows that no earthquake at all occurred on the day he had set, and his reputation as a prophet of signs and wonders is gone. But so credulous are many people in regard to such matters, that the next pretender to better knowledge of the future than every one possesses, will probably have as great success—before the event has proved that he knows nothing, and has merely hazarded a guess—as this charlatan had.

Indeed, it would not be at all surprising if this very same person, a year or two hence, when the memory of his recent complete failure with the earthquake has become dim, should venture once more to foretell a great tornado or some other wild freak of the elements, that even he should find believers by the thousand.

So far as earthquakes are concerned, no man living yet knows what causes them. How, then, can any one have a reason for expecting, and so far foretelling, such a disturbance? Not a single law has been ascertained in regard to these earth tremors. They occur frequently in one region for a time, and then they cease altogether. Some earthquakes are felt over a large, some over a small area. Science has formulated no law whatever as to place, time, frequency, extent, or the direction of the motion, and nothing could be more absurd than to suppose that any man can foretell an earthquake.

Almost the same thing is true of the weather. Science has evolved certain laws regarding the movement of storms when once developed. Even these laws are not invariable in their operation. What causes a storm is still completely unknown.

Let us explain: Every storm has a place of origin. Within a certain area, surrounded on all sides by regions where the weather is fair, the barometer begins to fall. The wind blows into that area, not directly toward its centre, but rather on tangent lines on which water is thrown from a rapidly revolving wheel. The sky becomes cloudy, and rain or snow falls.

This area of low barometer, or cyclone area, even while it is forming, begins to move. On one part of the globe the direction of the movement is toward the east, and usually, not always, to the north of east. Now the present limit of human knowledge enables a scientific man who is informed of the origin of such a storm, of the shape and size of the area affected, of the intensity of the storm, and of the general direction in which it is moving, to predict with reasonable certainty its future course across the continent.

That is all he, or any other man, can do. No one who is not possessed of the facts we have mentioned can do even that.

It cannot be too emphatically impressed upon the mind that the officer who makes up the "weather indications," and who is familiarly called "Old Prob," pretends to no special wisdom regarding the weather. He knows what to expect in precisely the same way as the telegraph operator who is directing the movements of railroad trains can tell you when a certain train will probably arrive.

The weather prophet may be likened to one who, with no knowledge of the road or its time-table, predicts that at a certain moment a train of seven cars will come into the station. He guesses at it, and it is about a hundred chances to one that his guess will be wrong.

No doubt the cause of storms will be discovered, some day,—perhaps next year, perhaps not for a thousand years. We may rest assured, however, that when anyone discovers it, he will hasten to tell the world, not only that he has found the law, but what the law is. He will not congratulate himself if he predicts correctly once in six times, but he will distrust his own law if he ever fails.

Until science lifts the veil which hides the mystery of storms, it is perfectly safe to treat every weather prophet, without a single exception, as a charlatan and a pretender, and to pay no more attention to their predictions than to the summer breeze. A prophecy which comes true is and can be only a lucky guess.

A public singer who was intolerably affected in his style, was utterly "taken down" when he appeared in Dublin, by an auditor who cried out at him: "Come out from behind your nose, you sniveller, and sing your song like a man!"

Salt Lake City.

Long after civilization, helped forward somewhat by the Edmund anti-polygamy act, shall have overthrown the Mormon hierarchy, and after Mormonism shall have been forgotten, the Mormon capital will perpetuate the fame of Brigham Young, and be proof of his great qualities as a pioneer and the builder of a city. Indeed, it was by building Salt Lake City that he gave the Mormon Church both the inspiration and its machinery for resisting civilization as stubbornly as it has. The City of the Saints has a history that has been written and read in every civilized tongue; it attained commercial importance even before its founder died, and it is one of the most beautiful of all modernly built cities. For its romance (and its founding was decidedly romantic, unless the Mormon point of view be taken, and it be called the result of an inspiration), for its commerce, and for the selection of so fine a site and for its laying out, we are indebted to Brigham Young. When the band of "Saints" were driven from Missouri they began their long march westward without definite purpose. But when in their journey across the great American desert their leader came to the valley of the Great Salt Lake, which is hemmed in on every side but one by high mountain ranges, he recognized in the alkali plain the proper site for a great city. He was "inspired" to build it, and he went about it with a vigor and a comprehension of the art of building a city which go far toward justifying his claim to a superhuman suggestion. Having irrigated the land and proved its fertility, he laid out the town precisely as it has been built. On a commanding position he set the Tabernacle with its oval roof. Near by was the Tithing-house, and nearer still the walls of the beautiful Temple have since been reared on the site selected by him. The "Beehive," which is the row of abode houses where his numerous family resided, is but one block away. And round about all this he built a wall, lest indolence should give time for discontent, and in order to carry out the parallel to Biblical town-building.

The streets were made wide, so that the holy city should not lack attractiveness, and down every street a mountain stream was turned, which constituted an ideal surface system of water-works and drainage. As the bishops and apostles became thrifty—and thrift is the prime virtue of the "Saints"—they erected finer adobe residences, and later wooden ones of pretentions to architectural beauty on the hill-sides at the base of the mountains. Through the yard of every one a mountain stream runs, which makes its way into a surface sewer, thence into the Jordan River, and thence into the Great Salt Lake itself. Within sight of perpetual snow, the flower yards of the Saints bloom early in spring, and keep their freshness till the late-coming frost in this rainless atmosphere. The air is as dry and wholesome as the air of Colorado, and nature does its own sanitary plumbing. Pavements have been laid now, of course, and magnificent drives lead out of the city. Residences of the rich have been built alike in the Mormon and in the Gentile section, large mercantile establishments have taken the place of adobe huts; but the wisdom with which the city was laid out has become plainer with all improvements.

The street whereon the "Beehive" was built was planned for the fine official residence of the President of the Church, which has been completed more recently, and the square that was set aside for the Tabernacle is large enough to hold the new Temple also. There is nothing lacking in site or plan to make the city a religious capital. And all that appeals to the religious zeal of the Mormons has appealed to the appreciation of the Gentiles. It appeals to the admiration also of all visitors. There are no hills nor hollows in the city proper, except where its outskirts have begun to extend up the slope of the mountains, which not much further backward becomes inaccessible. It is on one of these slopes that the founder of the city is buried, and around his grave is a plain iron fence. From this eminence a view is commanded of the whole city. It is extending year by year further over the valley. but there is not a single narrow street, not a house wherein the sunlight cannot find its way, nor one whereby a stream does not run, and from which perpetual snow is not visible.

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

No man ought to complain if the world measures him as he measures others. To measure one with his own yard-stick may be hard, but it is fair.

The range of friendship has hardly a limit. Intercourse is not needful to its continuance; equality in years is not a requisite; nor is parity of position essential. The finest natures triumph over social inequalities, mutual trust and affection can bridge over the chasm between wealth and poverty.

Of what avail are fortunate chances to one who has no ability, and whose head is turned by a little good fortune? To such a person a favorable chance in the begining of life is the worst thing that could befall him; for while a wise mind would have benefitted thereby, he is simply encouraged on to his own destruction.

Most girls, almost from babyhood, if permitted to be with their mothers in the kitchen, love to see the work done, particularly the cooking; and nothing delights them more than to be allowed to attempt to make some simple article themselves. This early play will not be forgotten. Girls that grow up under such training or indulgence will have no fear of the real care when it comes to them as a duty.

Concentration is a quality that we admire in the adult, but greatly undervalue in the child. We prefer that he may be easily drawn away from what he is engaged in and quickly turned from one thing to another at our pleasure; and, while we praise him for his ready obedience or rebuke him for seeming absorbed, we are really breaking down the power of concentration and depriving him of its invaluable results.

Natural desires should be trained to yield to the claims of a higher life when there is a conflict between them; but thera is no reason for suppressing them when there is no such conflict. On the contrary, it is the path of duty to obey the teachings of nature and to spurn them not. We cannot afford to leave any part of our being to itself, still less to ignore and despise it. All parts are so interdependent that the neglect of one involves the detriment of the whole: but each must yield when a higher good demands it.

During a severe thunder storm at Wellsville, Mo., last August, a vivid flash of lightning photographed on the smooth, white ceiling of the Methodist church the face of an old man with long flowing hair and beard. He locked them in his desk, his wife got well and found them, and now she talks of getting a divorce.

John Smith of Vallejo was attacked by a big buck in the Napa valley. Smith was unarmed and thoroughly surprised when the deer, instead of running away, ran at him full tilt. Mrs. Ed. Morris, of Chillicothe, Mo., put $85 in bills under the bedroom carpet, forgot about it at housecleaning time, carried them out with the straw that was under the carpet, and made a fire of the armful. On the surface of the little bunch of ashes where the bills burned were plainly visible the figures "10" and "5" and the word "dollars," as printed on the national currency.

Jonathan Bass of Cambria, N. Y., is a solid man. In 1848 his joints began to stiffen and grow into solid bone; in 1857 he took to his bed, and there he lies perfectly stiff, every joint solid, unable to stir, unable to masticate food, and blind. Yet he eats the heartiest food by sucking it into his mouth and swallowing it whole. His constitutional health is good, he keeps himself informed on current topics, and is likely to live many years yet. He is now 56 years old, and weighs but 75 pounds.

TEARS.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

Tears are the outflow of great joy or grief,
The speechless language of a swelling heart,
Whose fitful solace is a sure relief
For joys excessive, or affliction's smart;
The valve-escapement of a pent-up soul,
Whose fulness finds expression in a tear;
Which, like healing balm, makes the wounded whole;
Our dearest friend—when darkest hour is near—
Whose hands we clasp in friendship's sacred hold,
And cling to them like ivy round the tree,—
Weakness and strength combined in love's enfold,—
Then let the flood-gates open full and free!
Our bitter tears but give us strength to bear
Affliction sore, or joy's too sudden glare!

As word after word slowly and solemnly from the lips of ain Morton it would almost seem from lemn stillness that reigned in the little ouse, that the breath of life had, in- left the old man to whom he read it.

But such was not the fact. The attention of the dying man was so painfully excited that all his cries and all his groans were submerged in it; and he could only glare at Captain Morton with an expression that evidently had a doubt in it of his mortality.

Then the captain paused, and, in a voice in which there was more emotion than he had allowed to be manifest while he was reading the extract from the paper, he said:

"If you know aught of this transaction—if you can throw any light upon these mysterious hints concerning the fate of the American vessel, Sarah Ann—I charge you now, as you will have to answer before the judgment seat of Heaven for acts done in this life, to speak!"

A strange, hissing sound only came from the lips of the old man.

Captain Morton inclined his head close to him to listen if he uttered articulate words.

"Water! water!" he gasped.

"Yes! yes!"

CHAPTER XI.

THE WAIF FROM THE WRECK.

Captain Morton hastily glanced round the little boat-house and found a small barrel in one corner with a wooden ladle and found that it contained water. He brought it to the lips of the dying man, but with a querulous cry he dashed it from him.

"Poison! poison! You would and ought to poison me, and with such poison, too, as may produce the slowest tortures. Leave me! Leave me, now! Let me die in peace!"

"You have not answered me."

"Answered you—of what? Of what?"

"The Sarah Ann."

"Mercy, mercy!"

"Yes, infinite mercy. But you must answer me. What know you of the Sarah Ann?"

"Hush, hush! Who knows who may be even now listening at the doors. Have you drawn the bolt?"

"I will. There! There the door is closed."

"I will speak—I have always wished to speak. The words that I will utter have always been welling up in my throat and like to choke me. I will speak them now—I will speak them now!"

"I listen."

"Ten years ago—it was February—and the wild wind of such a storm as eyes of man had scarcely seen, and ears had not heard, was raging from the southwest. Ten years ago, here at Falmouth—that is near to here—at St. Just's bay—the smugglers' cavern. The secret, you know, that has been for all that time so well kept—the secret—yes, the secret cavern. I will not tell you; but the storm raged and the false beacon was on the cliff-top—for Dolan was a wrecker as well as a smuggler."

"Yes—go on."

"The beacon slowly revolved, and it was so like the light at the Lizard, that fleets—whole navies—might have been lost in the blind security of their onward course. I lit it."

"You?"

"Yes, I lit it! It was my duty. I thought it was my duty and I lit it. Oh, God—God! I hear the shrieks now—now ringing through my brain!"

"What shrieks?"

"Hush—hush! There was a ship—there was a ship! Do you hear me?"

"I do."

"She was deep in the weltering trough of that wild sea, but yet she fought with the storm. I saw her—I saw her; and she made to the east, as the seeming Lizard light beckoned her to do. I saw her by the flashes of the broad light that she burnt on the capstan-top before she struck. Her main-top-sail yard adrift, sails in ribbons. Her flapping sheets had torn the eye-bolts from her deck; her masts bending like straws, and still she fought the storm and neared the shore."

"Go on—oh, go on!"

"Fluttering in the gale was the ensign of the new nation—the American flag, and still she drove on—on to the shore of rock and drift. She struck! I heard the cries of those who were mangled in the wreck—of those whose limbs were mashed up with the crashing, parting timber, and then the wreckers went down the beach."

"Were all lost?"

"All—all. You shall hear. All but one."

"One?"

"Hush—oh, hush! I would not have those drowned souls hear us. Do you know that at times when the wind howls, and the cruel sea beats far up upon the beach, and sends its spray dashing over this poor house, they come—they all come—with their pale, dead faces, and their swollen features, and strive to drive me to madness? Hush! is that the wind now?"

"It is; but there is not not much of it. It only wails sadly over the waves. Tell me more."

"The ship was a ship no more. There was not a spar or plank six feet in length that held together so that you could say: This was part of a ship—except one mass which had some cordage hanging to it, and that is still in the cavern by the cliff—Dolan's cavern. You know that!"

"No—no!"

"You do—you do! Because spirits know all things. That portion of the ship held together and drifted to the shore. It was the bit that had the name on it."

"The ships name?"

"Yes—yes! The ship's name."

"And—and? Oh, go on! Tell me! What was the name?"

"The Sarah Ann, New Bedford."

Captain Morton uttered a cry and then, by a violent effort, recovered his composure sufficiently to say:

"Then I am to understand that the ship was lured to a lee shore by a false beacon and struck and went to pieces at once!"

"Yes—yes. And as the poor, weak, faint, struggling wretches who reached the shore crawled up through the misty froth of the sea they were one by one struck down."

"Horrible!—oh, horrible!"

"Dolan did it—Dolan did it! Not a man of those who are now with him were then of the gang, excepting one Gasket—he is there still. They have all perished in different fashions. There were eight to them. You will not betray me!"

"I will not. Go on—go on!"

"In the morning—in the dim morning, when the light of day struggled with the remnant of the storm, and when a faint gleam of sunlight fell upon the sea, we all cleared the beach of the wreck. It was piled up in different cottages and caverns, and before the warmth of the Summer was felt it had been all burnt. The bodies were all dragged high up and buried in the sand and shingle of the beach."

"But you spoke of one—of one who was saved!"

"I will tell you—I will tell you of that. My wife was alive then. I don't know how or why it was that she clung to me in all my evil life, but she did—she did. We lived in one of the small huts up the beach, not a mile from this spot by water and handy for the bay, as I was one of Dolan's men, ready for any wickedness—for smuggling, for piracy, for wrecking. Well, as I told you, it was evening again after the wreck, and I had not had so much of the plunder as I wished and so had struck her."

"You did not tell me."

"Did I not? My old brains get confused. Well, it was evening and I was discontented. I went to my own hut and I drank deep and was ferocious and struck her; and she sat still and only uttered short cries as I gave her blow after blow. And then I lay down in my hammock—for I had one slung for myself in the hut. What is that?"

"I heard nothing."

"Some one spoke!"

"No—no!"

"Yes—it was a soft, faint voice and it pronounced my name; and if I am not mad—quite mad—it was the voice that I have not heard for years—the voice of my wife. Did you not hear it?"

"I did not."

"She is here! I know that she is here and listening to me!"

"It may be so, but I pray you to tell me all."

"I will—I will. I don't know how long I slept; when I started awake and I heard my wife singing in a very low tone and at times as she sang I heard the whimpering, wailing cry of a little child. I had no child. I thought I was dreaming at first and I listened again; and then I was sure it was not. She was singing to and nursing a child."

Captain Morton had his hand upon the arm of the old man and shook him as a mute demand for him to proceed in what he was saying; for he had come to a pause and was muttering something inarticulately.

"Yes, spirit! Yes," he said.

"Go on—go on!"

"I will. But you are a spirit. It is so good of you—you who know all—to come to me, so that, when I appear before Heaven, you will be able to say that I did not die without confessing my iniquities."

"As you please. Oh, think what you please, but tell me all."

"Like a savage—or like a snake—I shrunk out of my hammock; first one foot, gently, and then the other; she did not hear me. Some of the wood from the wreck was slowly burning on the hearth and now and then it sent up a little flickering blue flame that lit up the walls of the hut and the woman and the child."

"The child?"

"Yes. There sat my wife—there was blood upon her cheek, where I had struck her; but there she sat—crouching down by the fire with a little child on her lap. She was chafing the little limbs and singing to it that low, sweet song. I was mad—mad."

"You did not—you could not—fiend! You dared not harm that little one!"

"Hush, spirit, hush! I will tell you all. I was mad, I tell you. There was fury in my heart and the hot liquor still held my brain. I raised a shout and was about to spring upon her. I don't think I knew what I meant to do or that I meant anything in particular; but she answered that shout of mine with a scream of fear and then she flung herself at my feet, and clasping the child to her breast, she spoke to me in a wild, screeching voice that was awful to hear.

"'From the wreck!—from the wreck,' she said. 'I saved it in the early dawn. It is a little child, Philip—a very little child. It lives, you see. Oh, spare it, spare it. No harm—it can do no harm to you. We are childless—no little eyes to look up to you, or to me—no little lips part to utter the name of father or mother to us. I saved it from the wreck. There was a tangled heap of cords and a basket, Philip, and I found the child. I thought it dead, but I have nursed it close to my heart and by the fire here: and it lives now. You will let it live, Philip, husband—you will spare this life.'"

"And you? And you?"

"I will tell all. It was with much more like this that she prayed to me and clung to me, and implored me, and I saw that she was madly bent upon the child, so I let her have her way, and the little girl—"

"The little girl?"

"Yes! She throve and lived, and grew, and my wife died. It was soon, then that I fell, and struck against the main hatch, and was half a cripple for life. Then, while I lay upon my hammock, Captain Dolan came to me—the fierce, bad man came to me. I saw that there was danger in his look. I could scarcely speak to him."

"That is the captain of the gang of wreckers you mean, Dolan?"

"Yes! That is the man."

"Does he still live?"

"He does! he does! It is upon what he calls his bounty that I, too, have lived. It is no longer wanted—it is no longer wanted."

"Go on, pray tell me all, and if you should by any chance recover from this attack of illness, you will have no necessity for again appealing to Captain Dolan. I will see to you."

"That will not be wanted. I know that I am dying—I know it too well."

"The child? Go on and tell me what became of the child?"

"I will—I will. She grew to be a pretty, gentle creature, with a thousand winning ways about her; and, as I told you, Captain Dolan came to me when I was lying almost at the point of death—and I did not want to die then. He asked me about the child, and I tried to make him believe that it was mine: but he had heard differently from the wives of some of the men, who had the secret from my wife; so he told me he knew all, and meant to take the little girl to himself—as he said that the day might come that she might be of good service to him, if he should want a friend. And then I said that she might, too, be of good service to me, if I wanted a friend—for then some inquiry might be made as to who she was, and I could take the credit of having saved her. And upon this he swore a terrible oath, saying that the only condition on which he would help me in my then condition was that I should entirely give her up."

"And you did?"

"Not just then. I slightly threatened him, and told him that I had dangerous secrets; and then a peculiar look came from his eyes, and he said to me: 'Hutchins—'"

"Ah! is your name Hutchins?"

"It is."

"Then you are the man mentioned in the ravings of the woman Cole, which are partially recorded in the scrap of newspaper I have read to you?"

"I am—I am. But that is not correct. I am not—I never was quite so bad as that would seem to make me. Oh! no—no—no!"

"Well—well?"

"The captain—that is, Dolan—thereupon told me how he only that moment spared my life because he had a tenderness for all that sailed under the black flag with him; but that he could get rid of me as easily as speak the words. And I felt and knew that, in so speaking, he spoke the truth, and so I let him have the child."

A choking kind of sensation seemed to come over Captain Morton for a few seconds and he could not speak.

The dying man rolled restlessly to and fro on his humble bed and groaned in agony of body and spirit, and the captain recovered sufficient composure to enable him to speak, and he said:

"Now, Hutchins, as you are on your deathbed—a fact of which you feel assured as well as I do—I beg of you to tell me all and to tell me the exact truth."

"I will—I will!"

"Where is that child now?"

"With Dolan."

"Where, though?—where?"

"In the cavern."

"What cavern?"

"You know it well. It is not hidden from you—you have eyes that mortals have not. Oh! you know it well—unless he has taken her to sea with him in the Rift."

"The Rift?"

"Yes, the pirate."

"I heard that name from some one on the shore only a short time ago in connection with some supposed expedition of a king's vessel called the Spray, which is in pursuit of it. Tell me if I am right. Is this man whom you name Dolan in command of the Rift?"

"He is—He is!"

"And he is the same who has the child?"

"Yes, Captain Dolan. Too late—too late! Hush—oh, hush!"

"What do you hear?"

"The service."

"What service?"

"The funeral service. I see the coffin on the grating and the flag is over it. I hear the service being read: 'Dust to dust—ashes to ashes!' The name is Thomas Hutchins. I am dying! I am dying—oh, save me! Help me! I did let the little one live, and never, oh, never in my fiercest anger did I raise a hand against her. I was kind to the child—I did let it live. Oh, spare me now!"

A loud knocking at the door of the little boathouse at this moment startled both Captain Morton and the dying pirate.

Old Relics.

Thrilling with that curious pleasure which comes to those of us who are romantic when turning over the relics of the past, with what interest we handle old letters, yellow with age, but still tied with the true love knot of blue ribbon; volumes of poetry with inscriptions of the enthusiastic sort, now out of date, written in an elegant hand on the fly-leaf, and with the tenderest verses marked with rose-leaves; silken scarves to which time has given mellow tints no buyer wots of; quaint garments that make one smile, yet which may have set off dimpled beauty rarely; a sword on which the rust of a century has gathered; a great watch that still has power to tick, though its maker and he who wore it have been ashes for generations. And suddenly, in the midst of our enjoyment, a thought will creep over us that makes our hearts stand still. The time must come—will surely come, if we leave anything behind us—when gay young folk, whose grandmothers are yet unborn, will some day find a treasure in some queer old things they have discovered, just fit for the next masquerade; and those "queer old things" will be our present best clothes—and the bonnet that was thought a "love" in Paris. They will peep into our letters, and try to make love-stories out of them, and wonder at our taste in books; and we—well, at least, we shall not be here. The earth will be ours no more—its pleasant places or its shadows, its griefs or its delights. As the rose we pluck, the odour we inhale, we shall be gone, as those are over whose relics we pore to-day.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are cured in from one to three simple applications made at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 King Street West, Toronto, Canada.

—Like every other appetite, the greed of money grows by what it feeds upon. Archer, the English jockey was rich beyond the demands of luxury yet he could not bring himself to abandon his gainful calling, which required a most exacting and trying regimen. The exigencies of his business undoubtedly contributed to the sickness which ended in delirium and suicide. He leaves over $1,000,000, but was anxious to make more.

—Lord Salisbury has shown that England will do all she can for Bulgaria without endangering her own interest; no more. England will be perfectly safe, of course, if she keeps on the side of the majority of the nations in the quarrel, but Bulgaria will have very little to thank her for. Russia is formention trouble in Bulgaria, and is at the same time preventing the Belgarian Government from punishing the rebels. Yet if the Bulgarian Government does not prevent serious rising, Russia will seize the country under the pretext of an occupation, Hungary is in earnest, however, in opposing Russian designs and she may drive the Austrian Empire into action.

SIR JOHN'S VISIT TO OWEN SOUND.

Somehow or another the veteran Premier appears to possess more magnetism than all our other politicians put together.

The different Stations from Orangeville to Owen Sound were literally packed when the excursion train came along on Monday last. 180 tickets were sold at this station, and other points in proportion. Markdale and and Flesherton Brass Bands were on board adding enthusiasm to the occasion.

Sir John stepped out at Markdale Station, while the train was adding another coach, and the throng pressed to have a shake hands with the Premier and were delighted with the unexpected gratification.

After the train moved off he made his way through all the crowded coaches shaking hands with every man woman and child, a circumstance which gratified their curiosity and delighted them above measure.

On arrival at Owen Sound a tremendous concourse of people were at the station; it is said the largest crowd ever seen in the town at once The streets and houses were profusely decorated with flags and bunting and the procession from Station to the rink, through the principal street, was a dense throng headed with a line of carriages with prominent party men and followed by seven brass bands (two of them Indian) at intervals along the procession, Markdale band and citizens showing to good advantage.

Speech making followed but the rink wouldn't hold half the crowd. We haven't space for a further report.

Editor Standard:—I am glad you have broken the ice in reference to the butter question. The present season has about closed both for the make and sale of butter, and it is well to have the important question thoroughly ventilated so that there may be on improvement in the way and means of the manufacture and sale of this staple article the coming season.

There is great room for improvement in the manufacture as well as mode of sale.

In the past, farmers have not generally looked upon this branch of farming (at least in this district,) of sufficient importance to warrant special attention or the necessary outlays to ensure the desired result, but while giving their best attention to other branches, (chiefly grain raising) the dairy has been allowed to take care of itself. The grain raising question has however proved so unsatisfactory and unprofitable, it becomes us now to cast about for something less expensive and more remmerative. It will not do to drop the grain altogether, yet we are compelled to pay more attention to stock and dairying, and in doing so, it becomes necessary to carefully consider the whole situation; the kind of stock we have, their feed and water, cleanliness of stables, (in winter weather) cool and well ventilated milk houses &c., &c. It is my candid opinion that if a high grade of buttter was made, a higher price would be obtained notwithstanding the present unsatisfactory mode of marketing

I also agree with you Mr. Editor, that creameries will be the first thing to revolutionize the dairy business. The expense of fitting up the way and means to manufacture a real first class article, is to great for every farmer to undertake even they did know how, and besides, it could not be expected that a tub of butter which took say three weeks to make could be as uniform in color taste and general quality as one which is all made from one churning.

The cheese factories have done a good work, but I hold we require the creamers as well, and until we have them, the standard of butter will not be A 1.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsib'e for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

Walter's Falls.

From a Correspondent.

Bonnell Bros have enlarged and greatly improved their mercantile premises.

Mr, Wickam, formerly a school teacher, has moved to town and joined Dr. McLelland in the general store business. He has also added to his family since becoming a citizen.

A lady in town lost a parcel rolled up in agents muffler one night recently, but found it after diligent search.

Delays are dangerous. Procure a bottle of West's Cough Syrup at once and cure that troublesome hacking cough and sore throat, relieving pain and misery. It is the household remedy for all throat and lung diseases. All durggists.

Holland Council.

This council met on 10th Nov. members all present.

Minutes of former meeting read and approved.

Galbraith—Williscroft,—That account for hall in Chatsworth for court be paid.

A communication from Jas. Murray, complaining of Stephen Edmunds flooding his orchard was read, but the council did not feel it their duty to interfear.

Williscroft—Shute; that Martin Dimma be allowed to perform two days statute labor for 1883 under Jas. Wallen, and that Mr. Wallen be instructed to that effect.

Williscroft—Shute; that the Inspector be appointed to fix culvert opposite McIlwains, Toronto line.

Money orders to the amount of $127,08, were passed.

'Howey—Galbraith; that council adjourn until the 13th Dec.

Berkeley

From our own Correspondent.

Our village has been quiet for the last month.

One night last week Mrs. Allen's milk house was broken into and a quantity of beef and tallow stolen.

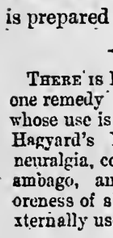
A BROAD HINT.—Some of our girls have had a wooden man put on their gate—Come come boys.

Mr. F. Prial was in Mr. Lackey's doing some business last Tuesday night, 9th, leaving his team on the road: When he went out the horses were gone; they ran about 4½ miles breaking the wagon to pieces, but no other injury was done.

W. J. Lackey has over-hauled his mill and has it now in first class order, and is prepared for any quantity of logs.

THERE IS NOTHING LIKE IT.—There is no one remedy offered to suffering humanity whose use is so universally and frequently as Hagyard's Yellow Oil, for rheumatism neuralgia, colds, sore throat, deafness' cronp ambago, and aches, pains, lameness and oreness of all kinds, when internally and xternally used.

Holland Centre.



From our own correspondent.

Glad to be able to report Mr. H. Mercer able to be round again.

Mr. Robt. Timson is very ill—not likely to recover. Inflammation of the lungs. He is 82 years of age.

Mr. George Little was severely injured by being wound around a connecting shaft at a threshing some six weeks ago which dislocated his hip. It appears they did not know the joint was displaced for several weeks when Drs. Oldham and McCullough of Chatsworth and McCullough of Walter's Falls put the joint into place. The unfortunate man also lost a child by death recently. We extend our sympathy in his affliction.

Ward vs. Holland Council are yet at loggerheads. They had a trial before Squires Hamilton and Price which was adjourned.

STRATFORD, June 6th. 1885. For several years I was greatly troubled with asthma, sometimes having to sit up for seven or eight nights in succession, unable to sleep and almost unable to breath. A friend recommended Dr. Jug's Medicine and Pill's. The first bottle gave great relief, after using six bottles was cured, and can now sleep and work as well as ever.

THE FALL CAMPAIGN.

The Fall season brings with it many necessities which cannot and will not be neglected. The people will buy what a change in the season makes necessary, this makes Fall Trade, and as fall trade is what we want, no stone has been left unturned and no opportunity neglected in securing such seasonable goods as will make our store the most desirable spot for close and particular buyers.

We ask the readers of this column to remember that outside our store, we do our talking here, but inside our store we allow the goods and prices to speak for themselves. In order that you may receive a benifit it is necessary that you should see our stock: In order that you come, it is necessary that you should be convinced that it will be worth your while. We must tell you of our attractions here, therefore do not think that we brag, but rather say that we are trying to put you upon the well beaten path that leads to the old established store, where everything is good, where everything is just as represented, and where everything is A 1 in value.

We would especially invite your attention at present to our Large and STYLISH STOCK of Dress Goods in all the new shades and material, with trimmings and Buttons to match.

TABLE FURNITURE.—In view of the fact that as a people we have weak stomachs, everything which tends to a sense of comfort and pleasure at the table should be fostered. Among the sources of good feeling, I reckon crockery, plate, cutlery and linen.

China costs but little more than the common ware, and is likely to receive better care and to last longer.

Plated knives, forks and spoons are now so cheap that every table may have an abundance. On some accounts plated ware is preferable to solid silver. When the Millennium comes in, I shall prefer the solid ware, but up to the dawn of that happy day, I shall listen with sincere respect to the prayer of light-fingered-people, "Lead us not into temptation."

Nice linen gives such pleasure to everybody that I shall not attempt a plea for clean table-cloths and napkins.

I should be satisfied with plainer and cheaper food, if neatly prepared and served upon snowy linen, with china and plate. I have no doubt there are people who, like blind men, only regard the taste of food, and, like pigs, have no choice about the trough in which it is served; but most of us are filled with a sense of satisfaction when surrounded by these clean, bright things.

I cannot mention a table economy more wise than the use of beautiful crockery and linen. It induces good manners, quiet, deliberate eating, and other Christian decencies. And it makes food look so palatable that the purchases and labor of cooking may be sensibly reduced.

An intelligent lady assured me that the sight of cracked wheat always turned her stomach, until she was visiting at Mrs. R.'s, when the wheat looked so white, the china dish in which it was put on the table was so beautiful, the fringed napkin and cream pitcher were so pretty, that she ate cracked wheat for the first time, and has ever since been fond of it. Very plain things can be made appetizing by a pleasant dress.

How true all this is of many things besides our food! I know more than one man, and more than one woman, without intelligence, Christian sentiments or manners, who are tolerated and even welcomed on account of their fine taste in dress. And is it not true that the mass of men regard the dress and manners more than the quality of soul within? It is the dish and the linen which decide the fate of more than one thing.

Headaches.

The approach of the winter season will, with a large number of people, be inaugural of a recurrent headache, for which they are unable to account at all satisfactorily, but which experience has taught them to expect as surely as fires and "snugness" are rendered necessary to personal comfort. It would be well if all such sufferers were to understand the rationale of the complaint that periodically attacks them, and be wise in time to ward off the return of their old malady. In every case where the headache is not dependent on some organic disturbance, and when it is felt only during the colder months of the year, especially in large towns, it is undoubtedly due to the vitiated atmosphere of rooms lighted by gas, and rendered "snug" by close-drawn curtains and draught-excluding doors, while a brilliant fire is maintained for heating purposes. This latter is, indeed, the only preventive under the circumstances of an absolutely poisonous condition of the air, which is very seriously contaminated wherever a gas-light is employed for illumination. The remedy for the evil is in efficient and constant ventilation, a necessity that every householder should see is secured in all the rooms of his dwelling before they are transformed into winter habitations.

Mind and Body.

Healthy body, healthy mind; or, healthy mind, healthy body. Keep the body healthy, the mind will be healthy; keep the mind healthy, the body will be healthy. A worried mind wearies a young body into an old one.

Old age often comes of rust, treadmill, living in ruts, learning nothing new, insisting one is too old to learn. A young man marries at twenty-three; the woman ditto; they give up recreation, get into a social treadmill, turn their lives into business, housekeeping, calling and receiving calls. At forty they are mere machines. Now they begin to lay up for old age; they begin to feel old, and they are old. Ericsson is active with work and invention at eighty-four; Gladstone, in his seventies, is ruling England; DeLesseps, canalling at eighty. To remain young we must act, feel and hope like the young.

Flowers at the Table.

Their beauty and fragrance add not a little to the pleasure of the table hour. A large, fragrant bouquet takes the place of an extra dish. And nothing is so cheap as flowers. During a considerable part of the year they cost absolutely nothing. It is the sweetest pleasure to grow them. And it is surprising how cheaply a small conservatory may be managed.

It is such a pleasure to observe how the love for flowers is increasing! Their sweet beauty brightens the most unexpected places while their presence inspires almost every pulpit.

The service of flowers at the table, In recalling the lost appetite of the invalid, has long been recognized. Their service in refining the appetites of all is not generally appreciated. It would take a brute to eat like one, at a table made sweet by the presence of flowers.

The Throat.

The throat is a wonderful instrument of music. Place the fingers upon it, and every time you speak you can feel the vibration of the vocal organs, producing sound. Anything that even touches the throat impairs the purity of those sounds. Fling a cloth over the strings of a violin or a piano, and get music out of it if you can. So every cloth which surrounds the throat impairs the sweetness of the voice. Women go with necks bare; men have theirs swathed and bandaged, and ten women have sweet voices where one man has. A man's voice should be as pure as a woman's. Why is it not? He is shaved and choked. God has provided a covering for man's throat, light and soft; it clothes the neck and preserves the health. But a man gets a sharp iron, scrapes his neck, ties a rag around it, takes cold, has sore throat, bronchitis, consumption, and dies.

MEN AND WOMEN.

Two Chicago women write "Rev." before their names.

Russell Sage frankly confesses that he goes to church to please his wife.

Mrs. Adelbert Baker dropped dead while dancing at a ball at Portland, Me.

Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher is writing gossipy letters from England to the Brooklyn Magazine.

Girls work in the coal mines of Belgium loading cars at 40 cents for a day of seventeen or eighteen hours.

Cella Thaxter frizzes he bangs, and so do Louise Chandler Moulton and Ella Wheeler Wilcox, if reports are true.

Justin McCarthy has cleared over $30,000 on his "History of Our Own Times."

The King of the Belgians has an eye on Queen Victoria's castle of Hobenlohe at Baden, and is looming up as a possible purchaser.

The fortune of Mrs. Mark Hopkins is estimated at $40,000,000. It was all made by her late husband in the Central Pacific Railroad,

A woman works in a Kalmazoo (Mich.) cooper shop, and can make as many barrels in a day as any of the men who work with her.

There are numerous Masonic lodges in France composed exclusively of women. They have all the fancy features and ceremonials.

"No man," says Ruskin, "has ever lived a right life who has not been chastened by a women's love, strengthened by her courage, and guided by her discretion."

Sir Arthur Sullivan, the composer, imbided his musical tastes from his father, who was Royal Bandmaster at Sandhurst. He spent most of his boyhood in his father's band room.

The ex-King Thebaw, of Burmah, does, not like his place of exile in Rutuagberry. He complains of dreariness and dullness, and says that his house is infested with snakes and scorpions.

It is stated that Joseph Arch has sailed for Canada with the intention of settling here. Mr. Arch was a member of Parliament for a few months. He sank under the weight of the Home Rule Bill.

Lord Randolph Churchill is a great coffee drinker, and is said to have a little gas stove of his own upon which he prepares his own cup of coffee each morning. He thinks no one knows how to make coffee but himself.

The ex-Empress Eugenie at last sees the hopelessness of the Napoleonic outlook in France, and has withdrawn the pensions which she has paid regularly to the supporters of the Bonaparte dynasty ever since the fall of the Empire.

The Empress of China has reigned twenty years, and will resign next February in favor of her son. She is said to be exceedingly progressive, and but for the men who formed her council would have had railroads throughout the Empire.

There is talk of a marriage between victor Emanuel, Crown Prince of Italy, and Victoria, second daughter of the crown Prince of Germany. Queen Victoria, Kaiser Wilhelm and Prince Bismarck are said to approve of it. If it takes place it will be the first marriage of a Protestant Princess into the House of Savoy.

When Joseph Cook, the famous preacher and lecturer, who is now in Canada, appears on the streets of Boston, he is dressed in a solemn black, carries a well known grip sack, and a long gap between the bottoms of his trousers and the tops of his Congress gaiters displays a glaring and gaudy expanse of red stockings.

Gen. Boulanger, French Minister of War, who has recently become a disturbing quantity in European politics, combines English grit with French dash. His mother was an English woman, named Miss Griffiths, and the General himself was born in Brighton, and he says his earliest recollections are of the time he played with the English boys sur le chain pier. Gen. Boulanger speak English with vernacular fluency.

A good many persons, after considerable mental difficulty, have been taught to believe that when Robert Burns wrote "Comin' Thro' the Rye" he referred to a little stream in the northwest of Ayrshire, called Rye, where the lads were given to lying in wait and kissing the lassies as they waded through the stream, their hands being employed in holding up their petticoats to keep them out of the water. Now comes Editor A. B. Todd, of the Cumnock Express, who is said to be an authority in Scottish literature, who was born a few miles from the Burns farm, and was intimate with some of Burns's cronies, and he says that the idea expressed above is pure nonsense; that Burns never saw and probably never heard of the Rye; that the description of how Jenny "draigelt a' her peticoatie" doesn't mean that she wet it in the water of a stream but bedraggled it walking through dew or rain-laden grain. All of which commends itself as being a sensible explanation.

Teacher's Rights.

"I say, pop," shouted Jimmy Tuffboy, as he raced into the house, "has the teacher any right to keep things what belong to a boy?"

"No, my son, she has not. What has she got that belongs to you?" "What has she got? Well, she's got my best jackknife, seven marbles, a glass agate, a dandy piece of string, a pocketful of horse chestnuts, my chestnut bell, and"— "That 'll do James. I will send over an express wagon and have them brought home." "And I am going to ride in the wagon!" grabbing a hot doughnut from the table he skipped out of the house like a young cyclone.

"Brother Foster," said a southwest Arkansas preacher, pausing in his sermon and addressing a member of the congregation who occupied a bench near the door, "the boys over in that grove are making a good deal of noise and disturbing the meeting. I wish you would go out and stop them." Brother Foster went out and returned presently with the information that the disturbers were not boys, but a lot of men from the county seat, who were hanging a horse-thief. "Congregation's dismissed," said the preacher, grabbing his hat; "we will take up the missionary collection next Sunday."

MURIEL'S THANKSGIVING.

BY MARY BRADLEY.

Little maiden Muriel, sad very sad is she,
Leans against the window-sill with big tears in her eyes,
Watches now and there and yonder the feathery flakes of snow,
Like white birds hurrying to a desert, ere departing fly and go.

She doesn't see how beautiful those pale snow-flakes are,
They make her think a diamond, now and then like a star;
She has no pretty fancies of cloud-lambs and their fleece,
Nor of the flying Goose-Woman plucking down from geese.

No, Muriel only sees the brown fields turning fast to white,
Which means somebody that she loves may not come to-night;
"And if she doesn't," says the child—and down her big tears fall—
"Thanksgiving Day will just be spoiled, and be no good at all!"

But little maiden Muriel has a mother wise,
Whose tender kisses dry the tears in the childish eyes;
Putting by her sewing-work, she makes her arms a nest
Wherein a little birdling with drooping wings can rest,

And guessing how to win her ear in quite the easiest way,
"Mother knows a story, dear" begins at once to say.
"Mother read a story once about a certain king
Who made his servant Lokman do a funny sort of thing.

"He waited at his table, and when the master dined,
As faithful as his shadow, the servant stood behind;
So oftentimes it happened when they two were alone
That Lokman got a tidbit, as a dog might get a bone.

"There were many dainty dishes set before this king,
Potted meats and sweetmeats—the best of everything!
Grapes and figs and pine-apples in golden dishes fine,
Silver pitchers full of cream and flasks of ruddy wine.

"And Lokman every now and then would get a share of these—
A glass of wine, a dish of fruit, a slice of mellow cheese;
It pleased the king to see him take with simple gratitude
Whatever gift he offered, and always find it good.

"But once, for curiosity—or in an idle jest—
He chose to try his servant by another sort of test.
He cut in two a melon that seemed to suit his mind,
And scooping out the fruity part, gave Lokman the green rind.

"Then watched to see him eat it—at first with laughing eyes;
But as he saw it disappear, with much more of surprise;
For Lokman ate the melon-rind in such a placid way,
That whether it were sour or sweet 'twould puzzle one to say.

"'Upon my word,' the king cried out, astonished and amused,
'If I were you, I should have said I beg to be excused!
But you take down the bitter dose, and keep a smiling face—
I never saw a foolish thing done with a better grace.'

"'Why foolish?' Lokman answered. 'You gave it me to eat
With the same hand that has bestowed many a morsel sweet;
Should I refuse to take it—or take it murmuring—
Because you choose to give me, for once, a bitter thing?'

"The king heard this with pleasure. 'Upon my word,' said he,
'There's wisdom in your argument that's quite as wise for me.
I'm far too apt to grumble at God my master's will,
And think when He sends trouble, that I am treated ill.

"'You've set me an example that, though I am a king,
And you a slave, good Lokman, is worth the copying.
Take this for thanks.' And gave him a jewel of his own,
A golden ring that sparkled with a precious ruby stone.

"Then who so glad as Lokman! The proudest in the land
Might well have envied such a gift from such a royal hand.
But modestly he wore it, and not with foolish pride,
And served his master lovingly until the hour he died."

"Is that all?" little Muriel asks, when mother's tale is done.
"How short the story is! It seems as if you'd just begun.
I wish you'd tell another." But mother shakes her head:
"Not now, dear; you shall tell me what this one means, instead."

"It means," says little Muriel, "it means—oh! I don't know!
See there how white the ground is, all covered up with snow;
It's just too bad, I do declare, when I expected May—
There will not be a bit of fun for my Thanksgiving Day!"

"But that's the lesson, darling, I wanted you to learn,"
The gentle mother answers. "God sends us in its turn
The sweet thing and the bitter, the pleasure and the pain,
Sometimes the merry sunshine, sometimes the snow and rain!

"We ought to learn from Lokman to take what may befall
With willing spirits, knowing our Father sends it all.
I wish, my little Muriel"—but Muriel suddenly
Cries, "Listen, listen, mother!" and jumps up from her knee.

She rushes to the window and sees through flurrying snow,
And all the gathering darkness, a moving thing below,
That nearer comes and nearer, until a welcome sound
—The trampling of the horses' feet—rings from the frozen ground.

"O mother!" screams the happy child. "O mother, it is May!
She's come at last! Now, won't we have a good Thanksgiving Day!"
And down with flying feet she goes the welcome guest to greet,
While mother follows—thinking of the bitter and the sweet.

She's not quite sure that Muriel has understood the thing
She tried to teach her with her tale of Lokman and the king;
But glad in all her gladness now, she hopes to see the day
When Muriel will bear trouble in Lokman's gracious way.

A Queer Love Spell.

H. C. DODGE.

In search of knowledge
He went to kcowledge,
And there was so busy
He often grew dusy;
His time was spent wholly
On deep studies wsolly
He wouldn't touch liquor
And never would sniquor;
He did his own sewing
And wouldn't go rewing;
He spent little money
And never was foney;
His heart was like gneiss
Until one day a gneiss,
Attractive and puisne,
Just made him go luisne;
His love was as great
As a bird's for its nest;
One morning he said,
"Sweet angel, let's wald."
And she told him "Your

Your heart mustn't ache
Any more for my sache;
So, as you may guess,
My answer is 'Yuess.'"

LATE DOMINION NEWS.

The wife of Peter Laddy, of Montreal, gave birth to triplets, two boys and a girl, last week, and all are progressing favorably.

Scott, a Marquette storekeeper, at the Winnipeg Assize Court now in session, pleaded guilty to twenty-three charges of forgery.

A true bill has been found against an Indian named Thomas Thomas for the murder of Harriet Gilmour at Selkirk, Man., in April last.

The North-west Council have adopted a motion granting pensions to the widows and orphans of the Prince Albert Volunteers who were killed during the rebellion.

A cat, not liking the new home at Greenfield, N. S., to which she had been removed, took her six kittens and walked with them back to her former home at Milton, a distance of 16 miles.

Asa Lewis, an aged farmer at Dudswell, Que., retired in good health one night last week, awoke during the night, asked his wife to get him a glass of milk, and was dead when she returned to the room.

Agnes Saunders, the young girl who mysteriously disappeared from the Coffee House at Ottawa a few days ago after intimating to a friend that she would drown herself, changed her mind, returned to her boarding house, and is alive and well.

A few days ago a student named Huntly assaulted the Principal of Moncton, N. B., Public School, distributed his clothes to the four winds of Heaven, and planted bruises on various parts of his face and body. The police magistrate will determine the extent of the damages.

While the family of Mr. Joseph Watson, lot 2, con. 13, East Garafraxa, were at church, fifty dollars in money, and promissory notes amounting to $1,475, were stolen from the residence. The servant girl's trunk was also opened and a purse containing $3 in silver taken.

The Evangelical Alliance of Halifax, N.S., are protesting against the running of horse cars in that city on the Sabbath. The agitation is wise and timely, and should be resolutely prosecuted. If the American Sabbath is ever introduced into Canada, depend upon it it will be by the street car or Sunday newspaper route.

Mr. W. C. Van Horne has replied unfavorably to the request of a deputation of Strathroy citizens, that the Western Ontario extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway be diverted two and a half miles from the proposed course in order to touch Strathroy, and now it is proposed to begin an agitation for a short line to connect Strathroy with the projected extension.

At St. Thomas a family named Gloisan partook of mushrooms for supper, and shortly afterward the father and two daughters were seized with severe pains and vomiting. An examination revealed the fact that several of the mushrooms were of a poisonous species. An emetic was administered and the patients restored. The consequences would probably have been much more serious had it not been that all ate sparingly of the plant.

A few nights ago the room used for a night school at Brantford was entered by unknown persons, the stove overturned, large daubs of paint smeared over the walls, the seats of the chairs, the gas globes, the ceilings, and floors, and other acts of malicious mischief and indecency perpetrated. The room had just been fitted up by the young ladies interested for the winter series of lessons, and the authors of the outrage are likely to receive very vigorous treatment if they are identified.

There is consternation in Hinchinbrook township in Huntingdon County, Que., over the seizure of smuggled goods in the possession of farmers. In one instance a farmer had to pay for shingles that had been on the roof of one of his buildings for over a year. Numerous mowers, ploughs, lamps, and other articles were attached, and the information in almost every case is reported to have been so precise that there was no possible means of escaping the duties and fines demanded by the Customs officers.

A Springfield, N. S., despatch says:—A great many accidents are happening in the coal mine here owing to the recklessness of the men. Broken arms and legs are of almost daily occurrence, while fatal accidents are very frequent. The output is at the rate of half a million tons per annum, and is limited by the inability of the Intercolonial Railway to handle freight. The sanitary condition of the town is deplorable. There are not half enough houses for the population. The water is abominable, and epidemic diseases are alarmingly prevalent.

It was noticed that an old man at St. George, N. B., spent a great deal of time in a piece of adjacent woods, and curiosity was excited to such a point that he was followed one day lately until he stopped before an open grave. It was found that in this grave a box had been placed and springs arranged so that a man could lie down in the box, and pull down a board when the grave would fill with earth, the brush arranged for the purpose would cover the mound. The discovery was made barely in time to save the old man's life, as every detail of his scheme of suicide had been completed.

A Tyandinage correspondent tells the following story:—"Rose Archer held a life lease of two acres of land from Wm. Tracy, Lot No. 4, 8th concession of Tyendinaga, upon which was a log house. She went with her son to Michigan by the Tuesday morning train, last week leaving the house and what little furniture she had in possession of P. A. Shannon, to be done with as she should wish, thinking that she would come back in the spring; but some person on Tuesday night broke open the window and door, pried the logs out of the house, so that the roof fell in, leaving the poor widow's house a wreck.

A Gravenhurst paper observes:—"It seems to us that hunting deer with dogs should be prohibited altogether; there would be more sport in still hunting, and there would not be anything like wholesale slaughter of deer. In a country like Muskoka, where there are many poor settlers who depend to a large extent upon the deer for their supply of meat in fall and early winter, it is an injustice to them that outsiders with a pack of dogs should come in and exterminate the supply. We wonder that the settlers do not petition the Legislature to pass a law prohibiting the use of hounds for hunting deer in the districts of Muskoka, Parry Sound, and Nipissing."

A young girl named O'Connor, eighteen years of age, disappeared from her home near Smith's Falls recently, and inquiries revealed the fact that she had gone away with a strange woman who had driven out to the farm the morning the girl was missed. The pair were traced to Carleton Junction, thence the girl was traced to Brockville, thence to Prescott, and finally to Ottawa, where she was found in a house on Murray-street. The girl's father was telegraphed for, and chancing to espy him coming, she attempted to escape, but was run down, and finally went home under a threat that if she persisted in her refusal to return with her father she would be sent to gaol.

The chief point made against Mrs. Dunlap, of Mink Lake, during the inquiry into the charge of murdering her husband, preferred against her, was in the testimony of Mr. James Dunlap, of Adamston, father of the deceased. When the old man was sent for to go to his son's place he was led to believe that the deceased was merely ill. It was not until he stood beside the corpse that he learned the truth, and then he ran up-stairs to where his daughter-in-law sat, and exclaimed, "Mary, how did all this take place, and you hear nothing of it." To this the old man thought she replied, "It was all done by one blow." Mr. Dunlap is a little deaf, however, and could not be absolutely positive that the accused used the language stated, and nothing could be adduced to corroborate or confirm his suspicion.

On Thursday last a serious explosion of dynamite occurred in Thurlow on the opposite side of the river from Corbyville. A number of men have been engaged for some time enlarging the great Government ditch which was constructed to drain the swamp land lying between the fourth and fifth concessions of that township. One of the number was James Bogg, a young man about 24 years of age, from Lindsay. Bogg was preparing dynamite for blasting, and found that it had been touched by frost. He had it in a fire to thaw it out, when he noticed that it was ablaze. He went forward to pick it up to extinguish it, when it exploded. He was thrown twenty feet from where he stood, but had hardly struck the ground before he was on his feet again and fleeing for his life. A second and more powerful explosion immediately followed. It was found that the left side of Bogg's body, from head to foot, was filled with small fragments of rock, and that two large pieces had made deep wounds in his hip. His condition, however, is not regarded as serious. The rock on which the fire was built was blown to fragments.

He Was a Cynic.

"She went straight up into the air, 500 feet, and I'll tell you, sir—"

"What," I exclaimed, "she went up—"

"Yes, sir," replied the quondam dude, "she did."

"What was the matter with her?"

"Boiler exploded."

"Great—!"

"Do not be surprised, sir," the quondam dude interrupted. "The lady—she was a lady—to whom I refer did not have a boiler attached to her person. At the time of the explosion she was on a steamboat of which I was the captain. She was—I mean the lady—as pretty as a picture and elegantly dressed. The force of the explosion sent her straight up into the air, 500 feet. When she came down on the return trip, she fell into my arms. I thought she'd say, if she was alive: 'Thank goodness, I wasn't killed!' but she didn't. She said. 'Oh my goodness, just look at that big hole in my dress!' So it goes, sir, so it goes, the world over. The gentler sex is controlled by one central idea, and that is dress."

The Russian Wolf.

Although the wolf has long been an extinct animal in the United Kingdom, it is far from being so in European Russia, where the value of domestic animals annually destroyed by wolves has been set down as not less than two million five hundred thousand pounds. In the statistical Report lately addressed to the Minister of the Interior, the frontier government of Samara suffered most, the damage being estimated at six hundred and fifty thousand roubles; Vologda came next, being five hundred and sixty thousand roubles. The Polish and Baltic provinces and Archangel suffered least. In an estimates like the above, no account can of course be taken of the number of wild animals destroyed by them, or of the loss of human life. The police reported one hundred and sixty-one persons killed by wolves in 1875. It is fortunate for the traveller that the wolf is one of the most suspicious animals is existence, in connection with any object with which its eyes, nose, or ears are unaccustomed. A stick planted in the earth with some fluttering piece of linen tied to it, is often sufficient to preserve the carcase of a slain Buffalo or deer for the hunter.

Better Whistle than Whine.

As I was taking a walk, I noticed two little boys on their way to school. The small one tumbled and fell, and, though he was not much hurt, he began to whine in a babyish way, not a regular roaring boy cry, as though he was half killed, but a little cross whine.

The older boy took his hand in a kind, fatherly way, and said:

"Oh, never mind, Jimmy, don't whine; it is a great deal better to whistle."

Jimmy tried to join the whistle.

"I can't whistle as nice as you, Charlie," said he, "my lips won't pucker up good."

"Oh, that's because you have not got all the whine out yet," said Charlie; "but you try a minute, and the whistle will drive the whine away."

So he did; and the last I saw or heard of the little fellows, they were whistling away as earnestly as though that was the chief end of life.

Trouble with Neckties.

Mr. Winks—"I'd just like to know if you women are ever going to get through with your follies. You have even taken to wearing standup collars and gentlemen's neckties."

Mrs. Winks—"And why should we not, I'd like to know?"

"Well, in the first place, it's an inconvenient fashion, anyhow. Even after all these years a man can't keep the necktie from crawling up from under his ear about half the time, and I don't see how women can hope to at the start."

"Our plan, dear, is to keep sober."

FARM.

Pasturing Winter Wheat.

Considerable feed can sometimes be secured by allowing the stock the run of the wheat fields during the winter. But it should only be done when the wheat has made a good strong growth in the fall. If sown late, as is often done, and especially where the fields are infested with the fly, more harm will be done to the crop than the amount of feed secured will make profitable.

As a rule, with all crops, good, strong, thrifty plants will make a much larger and more profitable crop than small, weak ones, and if the plants have not secured a good start to grow in the fall before cold weather sets in, and in addition they are kept pastured down during the winter, the plant can hardly be expected to make anything but a feeble growth in the spring.

Then, often, considerable damage is done by trampling when the ground thaws out and is soft and muddy. When dry or frozen hard of course tramping will do no harm, but a thaw out with the stock in the wheat fields, considerable damage will be done in a very short time. And in order to avoid this, considerable care must be taken to take the stock off when the ground is soft.

Then, in places, the stock will eat the wheat down so close to the ground, and keep it so, that the vitality will all be taken out, or so nearly so that the plant will die, or at best, make but a sickly, feeble plant in the spring. Sheep and horses bite down to the ground, and where a considerable number have the run of the fields, considerable damage is often done in this way.

So, that if the wheat is pastured at all, considerable care must be taken, or more harm to the crop will be done than all the amount of feed secured will pay for. In addition, there is always the risk of damage, as it is almost impossible to watch the stock all the time, a sudden change of the weather, or the stock will get to eating in one place, and the wheat will be seriously injured almost before you are aware of it.

Taking the risks into consideration, especially with late sown wheat, and I very much doubt, whether, on the whole, pasturing wheat can be regarded as profitable.

Green feed is, of course, often very desirable during the winter, but the surest way of obtaining it is to sow a patch of rye expressly for this purpose, sowing reasonably early so that a good growth can be made early in the fall. If this is properly done, a large amount of winter pasturage can be readily secured. But if this is not done, my experience is, that it does not pay to turn much stock in the wheat. While very often it can be done without any apparent injury, yet there is considerable risk to run, so that, at best, the plan can hardly be considered safe, taking one year with another.

And the safest plan is to make preparations ahead for winter pasture, and let the wheat grow as much as it will. There is considerable less risk of getting too strong a growth than there is of its making too good a start during the fall and winter. The more vitality the plant contains, the better they will withstand the winter, and care should be taken to get as good a growth as possible.

A Few Agricultural Don'ts.

Don't own more land than you can work well.

Don't imagine that you will ever get through learning.

Don't starve your stock nor skin your land.

Don't treat your horses with more consideration than you do your family.

Don't use poor implements.

Don't let your plow get rusty nor dull.

Don't let your mind get rusty nor dull.

Don't throw away money by allowing good manure to go to waste.

Don't expect your cow to do much better by you than you do by her.

Don't keep a worthless cur.

Don't chew tobacco unless you are willing to divide with your wife and family.

Don't expect that the Lord will help you unless you make a vigorous effort to help yourself.

Don't contract a debt unless you are sure that you can pay it and make money by it.

Don't stint your family in home comforts.

Don't put a dollar in the bank that is needed to make the house more convenient and the home more happy.

Don't growl.

Don't whine.

Don't lie.

Don't cheat.

Don't die without contributing your mite towards making the world better.

Timely Suggestions.

If you have any hog wallows on your place put some carbolic acid into them, either crude or crytallized. This will kill all germ life in the water; also kill lice on the pig and will benefit the skin. If the hogs drink the water the carbolic acid will not injure them. A small amount of carbolic acid is sufficient. This is next to filling the wallows up or fencing them in.

A good place for pigs at this season of the year is in the apple orchard. They have the shade, grass, and windfalls, all of which contribute greatly to their health and growth. Some contend that they injure the orchard more than the benefits received by the pigs. We think that they are of great benefit to the orchard, as they consume the apples containing the embryo worms which in time work injury to the trees.

An excellent practical farmer remarked a year or two ago that he considered a good clover seeding worth from $10 to $15 an acre. This is more than the profit of any grain crop, and it can be had when grain is sown by the outlay of $1.25 to $1.50 for clover seed. Here is a profit of 1,000 per cent in six months, without interfering with other crops.

Duplicate Wedding Presents.

Niece (showing the wedding presents to Uncle George)—I want you to see them all, dear Uncle George, so that you won't send a duplicate. Duplicate wedding presents are so annoying, you know."

Uncle George—H-m? What's this?

Niece—That's papa's check for one thousand dollars. Isn't it lovely?

Uncle George—Very. I intended to send the same thing, but rather than annoy you with a duplicate present I'll just make it five hundred.

RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.

Their Commercial Aspects—Dead Men Cost Less than Injured Ones.

Railroad accidents have, in the eyes of stock speculators, merely a commercial aspect. When the terrible calamity on the St. Paul was learned of Wall street wanted to know how many cars had been wrecked, how many lives had been lost, but especially how many people had been injured. The especial stress laid on this last would not be understood by the ordinary lay brother who is outside of a railroad office, unconnected with a law office, and who is not a stock brokerage expert. The passenger who is killed in a railroad smash-up costs the railroad company just $5,000. This is settled law. Decision after dicision has been made, and legal fight has followed legal fight until it is now accepted by litigants of all sorts that $5,000 can be collected as damages for the death of a relative, and no more. But while the courts have argued that for the protection of railroads damages for death shall be limited, by one of those unaccountable inequities of which the law is full no limit as ever been set on the sum that a passenger can sue for who has received simply an injury. And so a broken leg may cost a railroad corporation $50,000; a broken arm, $100,000; but the children can only collect $5,000 for the loss of their father; the widow can get no more for the loss of her husband. Dead lawyers count no more than tramps; dead millionaire bring after a railroad wreck $5,000; dead laborers cost the railroad just as much. If a millionaire, however, escapes alive from a smash up, he can probably get for his broken arm $25,000, while the laborer who escapes alive gets only $500 for his. This is law. Wall street is on to it, and really expressed itself as gratified the other day to learn that in the terrible wreck at Rio all had been killed; none injured.

The most frightful railroad accident that ever occurred in the West was within ten miles of Chicago, and right out on the prairie where there was no excuse for it. It was thirty years ago, when the Michigan Central and Michigan Southern were fighting each other, both at this end and in the East. They crossed at right angles at Grand Crossing. There had been a big fight when one laid its rails across the other's. Whenever two engineers passed down there they glared at each other. Trains used to race for the right of way, and there was the most utter recklessness. A Michigan Southern train loaded down with emigrants, was approaching Chicago along one line and a Michigan Central was racing along the other. The former got there first and was half way across when the Michigan Central engine plunged right into the centre of the train load of human freight. There never had been such a sacrifice of life by a railroad accident before. Men and women and babes were ripped and torn and burned. It was this massacre that created the law compelling all engineers to come to a dead halt at all crossings.

The Ashtabula accident is said to have cost the Lake Shore $1,000,000, paid out to the families of the dead, and to the sufferers from wounds. It made millionaire Amasa Stone crazy and led him to cut his throat in his bath tub. It was his bridge at Ashtabula that the Lake Shore train went through, and engineers declared that the pattern was bad.

In 1880 Capt. Prindiville left Detroit in a Canada Southern train for Chicago. Just the other side of the Welland Canal a broken rail caused the engine to plunge off the track and to upset. Every car in that train went over on its side, some of them on their backs. Not a passenger was injured. The Captain says that it was the most complete wreck he ever saw, and that it was marvellous that no one was killed. An agent of the company came rushing along in a few hours in a "special" with an attorney. Instantly, the Captain says, the whole train load of people who had been returning thanks to God were taken with spinal difficulties and all kinds of horrid injuries of one sort or another. He detected a young fellow who had sat next to him, and who had laughingly been congratulating himself on his escape, blacking his eyes with mud. The railroad agent wrote a check for $100 for that sly young man on the spot. The others got checks in proportion.

Singing-Stones.

A very curious musical instrument is now on view in the French department of the Amsterdam Exhibition. It consists of twenty-five large flints, suspended, harmonicon fashion, from two parallel wooden rods, and struck by two smaller flints by way of hammers. The peculiarity of the instrument consists in the fact that the stones are not cut down to any peculiar weight or form, but are virgin flints of various shapes and sizes, rough as when first dug out of mother-earth. The inventor, M. Baudre, a Frenchman, of St. Florent, in the department of Cher, states that it has taken him thirty years to perfect his collection, for which he asks the modest sum of sixty thousand francs, being at the rate of nearly one hundred pounds per stone. The stones when struck give out a clear metallic sound, like the note of a very high-toned bell. Strange to say, the note appears to have no direct relation to the size or shape of the stone, two of the stones being pointed out which are exactly alike in weight, and yet there is more than an octave interval between their respective tones. Similar paradoxical relations may be noted between others of their series.

A Natural Mistake.

Hotel Guest—"Waiter, how is this? Yesterday, desiring to make a present to my daughter at the dinner table, I put a $500 bill in a piece of cake and told you to hand it to her."

Hotel Waiter—"Yes, sah."

"But she says she got the cake and not the money."

"Yes, sah; beg pardon, sah. I thought you intend that for my fee, sah."

Corn Sowing

Is a process conducted by the agency of tight boots all the year round. Corn reaping is best conducted through the agency of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor, the only safe and sure-pop corn cure. Putnam's Extractor is now widely imitated. Beware of all poisonous and sore producing substitutes.

Autumn Thoughts.

There can be nothing sadder than the solemn hush of nature that precedes the death of the year. The golden glory of autumn, with the billowy bronze and velvet azure of the skies above the royal robes of oak and maple, bespeak the closing hours of nature's teeming life and the silent farewell to humanity's gauze underwear.

Thus while nature dons her regal robes of scarlet and gold in honor of the farewell benefit to autumn, the sad eyed poet hies away to the neighboring clothes line, and the hour of nature's grand blow-out dons the flaming flannels of his friend out of respect for the hectic flush of the dying year. Leaves have their time to fall, and so has the price of coal. And yet how sadly at variance the decaying nature is the robust coal market.

Another glorious summer with its wealth of pleaasant memories is stored away among the archives of our history. Another gloomy winter is upon us. These wonderful colors that flame across the softened sky of Indian summer like the gory banner of royal conqueror, come but to warn us that in a few short weeks the water pipe will be busted in the kitchen and the decorated wash bowl will be broken.

We flit through the dreamy hours of summer like swift-winged bumble bees amid the honeysuckle and pumpkin blosoms, storing away perhaps a little glucose honey and buckwheat pan-cakes for the future, but all at once, like a newspaper thief in the night, the king of frost and ripe, mellow chilblains is upon us, and we crouch beneath the wintry blast and hump our spinal column up into the crisp air like a Texas steer that has thoughtlessly swallowed a few cactus.

Life is one continued round of alternative joys and sorrows. To-day we are on the top wave of prosperity and warming ourselves in the glad sunlight of plenty, and to-morrow we are cast down and depressed financially, and have to stand off the washer-woman for our clean shirt or stay at home from the opera.

The November sky already frowns down upon us, and its frozen tears begin to fall. The little birds have hushed their lay. So has the fatigued hen. Only a little while, and the yawning chasm in the cold, calm features of the Thanksgiving turkey will be filled with voluptuous stuffing and then sewed up. The florid features of the polygamous gobler will be wrapped in sadness, and cranberry pie will be a burden, for the veal cutlet goeth to its long home, and the ice cream freezer is broken in the woodhouses.

Routine.

While routine sadly chafes enthusiastic and hopeful people, there are undoubtedly many who thrive upon it. We recall an old gentleman who was a perfect model of routine. He was borne, lived, and died in the same house, stood at the same counter in his own little-store for sixty years, selling about the same number of cotton spools, and rolls of tape, and yards of calico every day, and laying aside the same little profits every night; never speculated or had any superabundant stock; walked through the same streets four times every day between his house and his store, accomplishing in all about sixty-five thousand miles; never leaving home except when he went semi-annually to an adjacent city to buy goods; listened or dozed in the same pew every Sunday; never married; never went to any place of amusement; never read any but old-fashioned books, and those somewhat heavy; and, in short, was never known to move one inch out of his regular orbit. He travelled in a small circle, but it satisfied him; he was never unhappy and never anxious about anything; he had a good digestion, slept well, had no bad habits, no enemies, and, perhaps, no enthusiastic friends; he gave no offence in anything, was never elated, and never depressed, never soared, and so never fell, never sought or desired any change, and would have glided on contentedly for five hundred years, if death had seen fit to overlook him. If the world were peopled with men of this sort we might have great peace; but what would be our progress?

She Was Perfectly Willing.

"May I have the honor of taking you in to supper?" said a pretty little dude to a stylish woman who had mashed him.

"Of course you can," she answered, "and my husband, too. We were going by ourselves, but your company is better than none."

A COMMON EXPRESSION,—"I was troubled with liver complaint for three years, tried many remedies but never found any that has done me so much good as Burdock Blood Bitters." James Higgins East Templeton P. Q.

CONSUMPTION CURED.
An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a similar vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption Bronchitis, Catarrh Asthma and all throat and Lung Afflictions, also a positive and radical cure for nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having testified its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it. this receipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparingand using. Send by mail by addressing with stamp naming this paper W. A. NOYES, 149 Power's Block Rochester N. Y.

THE BEST COMBINATION.—The best combination of blood cleansing, regulating health giving herbs, roots and barks enter into Burdock Blood Bitters—a purely vegetable remedy that cures diseases of the blood liver and kidnies.

FREE TRADE.
The reduction of internal revenue and the taking off of revenue stamps from Proprietary Medicine, no doubt has largely benefitted the consumers, as well as relieving the burden of home manufactures. Especially is this the case with Green's August Flower and Boschee's German Syrup as the reduction of twenty-six cents per dozen, has been added to increase the size of the bottle containing these remedies, thereby giving one-fifth more medicine in the 75 cent size, The August Flower for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint and the German Syrup for Cough and Lung troubles, have perhaps, the largest sale of any medicine in the world. The advantage of increased size of the bottle will be greatly appreciated by the sick and afflicted, in every town and of village civilized countries. Sample bottles for 10 cents remain the same size. E. O. W.

There is no necessity of passing a sleepless night and annoying the entire household with that cough as West's Cough Syrup will cure you like magic. The best known remedy for coughs, colds, consumption in its early stage, and all throat and lung diseases. All druggists. 25c., 50c. and $1 per bottle.

SEVREAL THINGS WORTH REMEMBERING.
It is said that salt should be eaten with nuts to aid digestion. That milk that stands too long makes bitter butter. That rusty flat-irons should be rubbed over with beeswax and lard. That it rests you in sewing to change your position frequently. That a hot strong lemonade taken at bedtime will break up a bad cold. That tough beef is made tender by lying in vinegar water. That a little soda will relieve sick headache caused by indigestion. That a cup of strong coffee will remove the odor of onions from the breath. That a cup of hot water drank before meals will prevent nausal and dyspepsia. That well ventilated bedrooms will prevent morning headaches and lassitude. That one in a faint should be laid on the flat on his back, then loosen his clothes and let him alone. The consumptive night sweat may be arrested by sponging the body nightly in salt water. That a fever patient can be made cool and comfortable by frequent sponging off with soda water. That to beat eggs quickly add a pinch of salt; salt cools and cold eggs froth rapidly. That the hair may be kept from falling out after illness by a frequent application to the scalp of sage tea. That you can take out spots from wash goods by rubbing them with the yolk of eggs before washing. The white spots upon varnished furniture can be disappear if you hold a hot plate over them.

Thisis to certify that I have used McGregors Speedy Cure for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint, and do honestly say that if it cost me one hundred ($100.00) a bottle I would not be without it, as it has done me more good than all the medicines I ever used, and I feel like a new man.—Yours truly, ALEX. STEEL, Carleton Place, Ont. This medicine is for sale at 50c. and $1.00 per bottle at R. L. Stephen's Drug Store. 1

MINERAL POISON.

Painfully Sad.—Last week Mrs. Robert Williams, a good christian woman one mile from Markdale, pas'd peacefully away after a short illness. Mr. Williams her husband, received injuries from a fall a number of years ago which so affected his reasoning faculties that he has not been altogether right since, and at times quite deranged but not dangerous. The death of his wife was however too much for his weak state of mind, and he became dangerous, so much so that he had to be sent to jail for safe keeping the day previous to the funeral. This is indeed a sad affliction for the family, who are highly respected and have the sincere sympathy of the community.

HEALTH.

A Tea Toper.

"The cup that cheers but not inebriates" has been the song of poets and the solace of millions for more than an hundred years, and its innocence has been almost unchallenged during a greater portion of this time; but within the last quarter of a century there has been a growing suspicion that the steaming decoction has something besides comfort in it, and now there are hundreds of scientific physicians who are speaking out plainly against the use of both tea and coffee, on the ground that they are stimulants which are capable of producing effects upon the nervous system different only in degree from those which arise from the use of alcohol, opium, tobacco, and other narcotics and stimulants.

Startling as the fact may be to those who have never had their eyes opened to the real character of these common but by no means harmless drugs, it is even asserted that there are persons to be found who are veritable tea-drunkards. Dr. Arlidge, an eminent English physician, states that there are thousands of tea-drunkards among the lower classes in England, and he very forcibly remarks as follows:—

"A portion of the reforming zeal which keeps up such a fierce and bitter agitation against intoxicating drinks, might advantageously be diverted to the repression of the very serious evil of tea-tippling among the poorer classes. Tea, in anything beyond moderate quantities, is as distinctly a narcotic poison as is opium or alcohol. It is capable of ruining the digestion, of enfeebling and disordering the heart's action, and of shattering the nerves generally. And it must be remembered that it is not a question of narcotic excess merely, but the enormous quantity of hot water which teabibbers necessarily take is exceedingly prejudical to both digestion and nutrition. Our teatotal reformers have overlooked, and even to no small extent encouraged, a form of animal indulgence which is as distinctly sesual, extravagant and pernicious as any beer-swilling or gin drinking in the world."

The term "tea-drunkard" is well known throughout Russia, where tea is used much stronger than is common in this country. A dozen cups of strong tea taken after the Russian fashion, without cream or sugar, simply flavored with a little lemon juice, in the course of a couple of hours, will produce effects as distinctly intoxicating as an equal quantity of light wine or lager beer.

The leaves of the cocoa tree are used in South America in the same way that tea leaves are used in this country, and are found to possess the same properties for which tea is used. Many of the natives acquire the habit of chewing the leaves and swallowing the juice, instead of steeping the leaves and drinking the decoction. The cocoa-chewer asserts that his habit is a harmless one, and affirms that by means of it he is able to work and to travel long distances with little food, which he could not do without it. However, Dr. Hartwig, an eminent writer and distinguished traveler, asserts that the cocoa-chewer is affected by his practice not less injuriously than the opium-eater. In his interesting work, "The Tropical World," we find the following description of a cocoa-chewer:—

"He is known at once by his uncertain step, his sallow complexion, his hollow, lusterless, black rimmed eyes, deeply sunk into his head, his trembling lips, his incoherent speech, and his stolid apathy. His character is irresolute, suspicious, and false. In the prime of life he has all the appearance of senility, and in later years sinks into complete idiocy. Avoiding the society of man, he seeks the dark forest, or some solitary ruin, and there for days together indulges his pernicious habit. While under the influence of cocoa, his excited fancy indulges in the strangest visions, now reveling in pictures of ideal beauty, and then haunted by dreadful apparitions."

Theine, the active principle of tea and coffee, when taken in any but the smallest doses, produces all the symptoms of intoxication.

The eminent Dr. Edward Smith, of London, in making some experiments with tea and coffee some years ago, took, with his assistant, an infusion of two ounces of coffee, containing so small a quantity of theine as only seven and one-half grains. Both fell to the floor unconscious, and remained in this state for several hours.

A prominent official in the British army, when doing service in Africa, lost his favorite horse in a manner which was both singular and instructive. The cook left a few pounds of tea in the sack which had contained it which was filled with corn by a Kafir groom who knew nothing of the presence of the tea. Upon serving out the corn to a troop of horses, of course the last one received the larger share of the tea, which was eaten greedily by the hungry animal along with the corn. The result is thus described:—

"The animal plunged and kicked and ran backward, at intervals galloping madly around, finally falling into a donga, where it lay dashing its head on the rocks, and was dispatched by an assegai thrust through the heart. The post-morteom appearances indicated extreme cerebral congestion."

In view of these facts is it not evident that the poetic eulogy of tea should be modified by the change of one little word, so that it will read, "The cup that cheers and yet inebriates?" and is it not apparent that a thorough going temperance reformer will wish to abstain from the use of these beverages when he becomes aware of their real character?

Breaking Away From Tobacco.

A correspondent writes as follows: "I have chewed tobacco for about twelve years, and would like very much to stop using it. But it has taken such a hold on me that when I cease using it for two or three days, I break down, and am unfit for work. I am affected like one broken down with malaria, chills and fever. Now is there anything that such a one could chew which would keep the throat and mouth moist, and in time destroy all taste for the weed?"

This difficulty in leaving off the use of tobacco is natural. The drug effects such a change in the whole working machinery of the system that the sudden withdrawal of the narcotic arrests its proper action, or throws it into a very peculiar morbid condition. It is the same with opium and arsenic. If one leaves off his wonted use of arsenic, there will be loss of appetite, burning in the stomach, spasms in the throat, difficulty of breathing, and constipation, but on resuming the drug, all these symptoms will cease. Such nausea, vomiting, diarrhœa, mental depression, and general prostration follow the withholding of opium that the man of the strongest will is often unable to break the chains that bind him without medical aid.

There is a difference, however, in a case of different persons, as there is a difference in the effects of the tobacco on them. These effects are greatly worse in brain-workers, the highly cultivated, and men of nervous temperament, and it is in just these classes that we find most of those who seek deliverance from the noxions habit. To Canadians and Americans, with their highly developed nervous organization, tobaccois more harmfulthan to any nation.

What answer, then, shall we give our suffering correspondent?

Simply this, that probably his wisest, surest and cheapest course would be to put himself for the time into the hands of a good physician, just as if his symptoms had no connection with tobacco. He needs medical aid, and he needs aid just suited to his individual peculiarity.

We add, however, that for something to take the place of the accustomed quid, and also to act as a tonic on the stomach and system generally, we know of nothing better than simple chamomile. Let him get a quantity of the dried flowers and take a few from time to time through the day.

Harrison H. Oliver of Bolton, is noted for having 101 bullet wounds on his body. Sixty bullets, ranging in size from a duck shot to an ounce ball, remain in his body.

There are 100,000 farmers in the farming district of Texas, lying between the cotton district of the coast and the grazing lands of Northwestern Texas, who need 100,000 bushels of wheat for planting this month. They have lost three crops from the drouth which has prevailed for the past year, and most of them have nothing except their farms.

Stalef Auglepper, a Russian, was arrested at Port Moody, B. C., the other day by one of the Dominion detectives. He had been in town only ten days, but had made sketches of the harbor and fortifications here which he had inclosed to the private secretary of the Czar. They were found in an envelope on his person. The belief is that he intended to make a plan of the harbor in case of war between England and Russia over Bulgaria.

Furs and Fur Hunting.

To the north and west of us—all over that vast country of which so little is even now known, the Hudson Bay Co. and its faithful servants, the Indians, are engaged in the fur business.

From the shores of Lake Superior up to Hudson's Bay and away to the Arctic Circle, through lonely Labrador and the untrodden wastes that lie under the shadow of the Rocky Mountains, the trading posts of the Hudson Bay Co. are to be found, and to these posts the Indians repair after the long winter's hunt, and barter their furs for whatever the Company likes to give them. The march of civilization has driven the fur hunters further north and west. Still an immense trade is done in the far north and will continue until civilization can make some use of the barren rocks and stunted vegetation of that inhospitable country.

Just now the prices paid for raw furs are by no means steady. This is, no doubt, due to the unsettled state of Europe where the great bulk goes. A war in Europe would spoil the trade for a time, and prices would fall.

Self-Sacrifice.

If we analyse the acts we instinctively approve in ourselves and applaud in others, we shall find that many of them involve a certain degree of self-sacrifice, while those which we deplore in ourselves and criticise in others involve some kind of self-indulgence. The man who risks his own life to save another from the sinking vessel or the burning building, he who devotes his youth and energies to a philanthropic enterprise, he who habitually sacrifices his ease and comfort to soothe the declining years of an aged parent or to cheer the sick-bed of a wife or friend, awakens sympathy and approval from all. This instinct of our nature sufficiently proves the praiseworthiness of sacrifice and its value as a means of human progress.

Excellent Speech.

All the qualities which are attributed to excellent speech will be found to have their roots in excellent character. Men admire its clearness and accuracy; they come from a love of the truth and a desire to convey it exactly. They value its vigour and raciness, which flow from the active and vigorous mind. They delight in its intensity and tenderness, which are the natural outpouring of intense and tender feelings. The cheap imitations of these excellences, even when aided by proficiency in the study of language and expertness in its use, can never communicate the same impressions or convey the same ideas. Like counterfeit coin, they lack the ring of the true metal.

Wouldn't Adopt the Plan.

Mrs. Winks—"Oh, dear! I don't see why I can't keep good girls when I get them. I do my best to pet them up."

Mr. Winks—"Has the new one left?"

"Yes; left this morning."

"Well, get a new one and I'll try."

"How thoughtful you—I—I guess I'll do the work myself."

Honest and True.

This is eminently the case with Polson's Nerviline, the great pain cure. It is an honest remedy, for it contains the most powerful, the purest, and most certain pain subduing remedies known to medical science. It is honest, for it does all it claims to do. It is honest, because it is the best in the world. It only costs 10 or 25 cents to try it, and you can buy a bottle at any drug store. Nerviline cures toothache, neuralgia, pain in the back and side. All pains are promptly relieved by Polson's Nerviline.

"What pretty children you have," said the new minister to the proud mother of three little ones. "Ah! my little dear," he said, as he took a girl five on his lap, "are you the oldest of the family?" "No, ma'am," responded the little miss, with the usual accuracy of childhood, "my pa's older'n me."

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. RIFT AND SPRAY;

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XII.

THE SHOT THAT MADE THE RIFT A PIRATE.

Some portion of the strange and exciting scene that was taking place on the deck of the Rift could not fail to reach the ears of Gerald and of Captain Mocquet, although doubtfully, it was not very intelligible to the latter.

From the tones of the crew and from the excited, artificial voice in which Dolan spoke, he felt certain that some circumstances were on foot that were out of the common course, and he made his way up the ladder to its covering, close to which he placed his ear in order that he might listen to what was passing.

Gerald was a prisoner and in the hands of an inveterate foe, so that he felt quite justified in learning all he could. He, moreover, felt a degree of interest in the safety of Marie which he would have found, perhaps, difficult to define to himself.

He could not comprehend how it was that whenever he thought of Marie and the tender, fearless caresses she had bestowed upon him, the image of Grace would rise as if between him and the young French girl. He looked upon Grace as a sister and began to cherish a hope in his heart that she, too, would love Marie and that possibly by some rare and dear combination of circumstances, they might all reside happily together as a united family with Captain Mocquet.

Gerald's ideas on such subjects were very crude and immature.

But whatever might have been the character of the day-dreams that at times took possession of his imagination in regard to Grace and Marie, they were soon absorbed in the present danger that threatened himself.

The shots from the Spray had been watched with painful anxiety by both Gerald and Captain Mocquet, and they had been for a time somewhat surprised that the Rift had not fired in return; but upon reflection, coupled with what he had heard passing below, Gerald now felt that he knew the reason why.

One shot from the Rift at the king's ship converted the smuggler into a pirate and it would be never forgiven, as the blackening corpses of some ten or twelve pirates swinging on a gibbet by the Nore, even so late as the year 1822, sufficiently testified.

"I will not fire the gun!" said Gerald, who hastily descended to the cabin.

"What shall you go to do?" said Captain Mocquet.

"They want me to fire on the Spray."

Captain Mocquet put on an inquiring look and evidently did not understand what Gerald meant.

"Quoi?"

"They want me to commit myself to them and their evil life by firing at a king's ship, but I will not do it."

"Ah! bah! no! What you say! One proverb—one say of English. You shall not give de cheval—the horse over the water and he will not made him drunk. Ah! Bah!"

"You mean, sir, our English saying, that you may bring a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink."

"Oui, certainement. It is tout le meme."

It was at this moment that the hatchway was opened and a confused shouting of voices came upon the ears of Gerald, as the half dozen of the crew descended to drag him up.

Gerald held forcibly by the cabin table.

"Hilloa there! Hilloa there! You are a nice one for the old 'un to crack," shouted Jackson. "Come up; tumble up, will you, you lubbers? We want you to do a little job on deck, that's all. Only to fire a gun that's all—ha! ha! That's all."

"It is false! It is all false!" cried Gerald. "The letter is false. It is a cheat! I did not write to the port admiral."

"Now there!" said Dolan, who had come halfway down the hatchway, "now there. Do you hear that, my men? He confesses it."

"I do not confess it, Dolan," said Gerald, "and I know you speak what is not true. I deny it with all my heart, with all my strength—I deny it! As heaven hears me, I deny it!"

"Deny what?"

"That I wrote to the port admiral betraying the Rift and its crew!"

"Now, look you here, my men," cried Dolan. "Out of his own mouth we convict him. Has any of you told him that we have accused him of that? Who has said a word about the port admiral, or the betraying of the Rift, or the Rift?"

"Not any of us," said Jackson.

"And yet, you see, he knows all about it."

A groan of rage came from the crew.

"I heard it," said Gerald. "I listened at the inner side of the hatch, and heard it."

"Oh, what a come-off!" cried Dolan. "No, no: that won't do. Will it, my men?"

"No, no," was the cry. "Up with him! Up with him! Now, young gallow's-bird; up with you."

"Hold, what you call hard!" shouted Captain Mocquet, as he sprang forward and called for the release of Gerald. "Hold! It is not that you should go to have him!"

The lawless crew liked nothing better than the interference of the French captain, in which as it gave one or two of them an opportunity of dealing to poor Mocquet some of those straightforward Anglo-Saxon blows on the region of the stomach and head that are always so utterly bewildering to a Frenchman.

Captain Mocquet, in another moment, might be seen sitting in a remote corner of the cabin, propped up against an angle of the wainscotting, and looking very rueful indeed, as he gasped out:

"Ma foi! This is what you call him, the English box."

The main force Gerald was borne on to the deck of the Rift.

The only two of the men who had not taken an active part in this transaction were Jackson and old Martin. To be sure, the latter was at the wheel; but had he not been, there is no doubt that he would have kept this neutrality on the occasion.

Indeed, there was a stern look upon the face of the old sailor of disapprobation of the whole affair; and when his eye caught those of Ben Bowline, he gave a short nod and pointed to the wheel, which Ben understood to be an appeal to be relieved.

"You, Jack Gooding," cried Ben Bowline; "take your spell at the wheel."

"Ay, ay."

"Who gives that order," shouted Captain Dolan, "while I am on the deck?"

"I do!" roared Ben Bowline, in as loud a key or probably a little louder.

"Oh, you do?"

"I do. I thought I was captain of the watches on the Rift. I thought I was first officer; but I don't want to be. I say I don't want to be, but while I am, I will do my duty. Part of that duty is to change the watches—part of that duty is to give the proper men spell and spell about at the wheel, and I will do it. I did give the order, Captain Dolan. And what then?"

This bold defiance seemed to search up the very life-blood of Dolan, and his face turned almost livid with rage. He plunged his hand into the breast of his apparel to seek for the hidden weapons that he had there, and as he did so he glared round upon the crew to see what chances of support he had, in case of coming to an open rupture with Ben Bowline, or in case of asserting his supreme authority by taking his life.

He would have been glad to do that.

But there was a look about the crew of the Rift that warned Dolan how little real power he had over a throng of men banded together for the purpose that made them companions. And he made a great effort and swallowed his chagrin.

"My men," he said, "I know and you all know that we must have discipline, and I, for one, think that when I am actually on deck all orders should come from me. So let Jack Gooding take his spell at the wheel."

This was a sort of compromise of the matter, but still something more might have come out of the transaction if an incident had not just then taken place which was of a much more absorbing character and which fully occupied all the thoughts of the crew of the Rift.

The Spray had got on a breeze that very much favored its capabilities in sailing, and as the Rift had not been making any extraordinary exertions to increase the distance between them, the Spray had succeeded in lessening the distance sufficiently to be able to use her guns with more precision than before.

There was a sharp report, a bright flash and a puff of white smoke, all mingled together, and then a crash was heard on board the Rift and the cutter lost her way and swung round on the wind, her sails flapping and bearing against her mast as though they would each moment fly into ribbons.

"Look to the wheel, you lubber!" shouted Ben Bowline. "What do you mean by that? Ah!"

Ben's exclamation arose from his sudden understanding of what had happened. The shot from the Spray had hit the man who had so very short time before taken the helm and had dashed him from his post, leaving him a mangled corpse upon the deck, while the wheel swung round and broached to the cutter.

At this sight the crew raised a shout of rage and one voice called out:

"The black flag—the black flag! Fight it out and sink the man slayers!"

Martin was at the wheel again and the cutter was brought up to the wind without injury, and then Captain Dolan, looking ghastly pale, said:

"You see, my men—you see! This is what has come of treachery!—this is what has come of a letter to the port admiral. Make sail! She is overhauling us hand over hand. Make sail!"

"Ay, ay, sir."

"And you, spy and traitor, if you were ten times my son, you should fire on the king's ship!"

"I will not!" said Gerald.

"Lay the gun! Point her, Ben Bowline—you should know how to do that. The port fire here—quick! You will not fire the gun?"

"I will not."

"Ah, we will see to that!"

The confusion on the deck of the Rift was now very great. The whole of the crew seemed to be at once fully alive to the danger of their situation, and while some of them eagerly bent a new and strange looking sail to the yard, the others kept a firm hold of Gerald and strained their eyes to look for the Spray,

The evening had now fairly set in and a great ruck of dark clouds appeared to be not half a mile from the surface of the sea, and to confine between them and it a quantity of baffling winds that seemed to be dancing in short, squally puffs in different directions, as if intent upon escape from the pressure.

The presence of the Spray was soon very easily detected.

The schooner had some optical apparatus on board by which a strong ray of light was sent far over the sea, falling like a spirit upon the agitated water. The crew of the Rift saw that strange, large circle of light slowly moving along and they felt certain that in a few seconds it would fall upon the cutter.

"Keep her away," cried Ben Bowline; but it was easier to give the order than to execute it; for although the circle of light that was upon the surface of the sea looked like a thing by itself, yet it was but the culmination of the ray from a lens; and at any part of the ray that the Rift might be found upon it and so bring it fairly and easily into view.

It was in vain, then, that Martin altered the cutter's course a point or two, as he looked anxiously at the singular light.

Another minute and it was within a couple of hundred yards of them, looking like a gigantic arc of a circle, which must embrace all objects within its radius.

Then there was a loud cheer from over the sea. The light had fallen upon the Rift and the crew of the Spray knew where to direct their fire.

"Crowd all our canvas!" shouted Dolan. "Do we gain on her?"

"Ay, sir—fast!"

"That will do. Ah, look out!"

He did look out himself, for at the flash of another gun from the Spray, he leaped from the gun on which he stood and crouched behind the port bulwarks.

The shot tore its way through some of the cordage of the Rift, and then Ben Bowline cried out:

"We must cripple that craft, or it is all up with the Rift!"

"Yes," shouted Dolan, "fire on it—fire! And as I am a living man Gerald shall do it! I swear it—I swear it! He shall fire the first shot that makes the Rift a pirate!"

CHAPTER XIII.

THE BATTLE IN THE BAY—GERALD'S DANGER.

It was quite clear that the Rift was, even under ordinary circumstances, by far the faster craft than the Spray, for the distance between the two vessels now increased with great rapidity.

The only wonder to the officers of the Spray was that the Rift should allow herself to be chased right in shore in the way she did.

They did not expect a fight.

But Dolan had special objects to carry out and in every one of his actions on that eventful night those special objects were remembered. What they were in their entirety—and, we may add, in their villainy—will but too soon become painfully apparent.

Watching closely the Spray he was resolved that the distance between it and the Rift should not be so great as to prevent the conflict from taking place, on which he relied for one of his purposes, which was thoroughly to commit Gerald to all the pains and penalties of being one of the crew of the Rift and of firing on a king's ship.

The ghastly body of the man who had been killed at the wheel was flung, without any ceremony, into the sea and then Dolan cried out:

"My men, you know as well as I do what we are about to do, but it won't hurt us now, as we are about to bid a long goodbye to this coast and I, for one, would fain that the government schooner should have a taste of our real quality before she goes and before we go."

"Ay, ay!" shouted the crew.

To be sure, there were some two or three among their number who looked with no small amount of apprehension upon the act of firing upon the schooner, and who would much rather have been taken—if they ever were taken—simply as smugglers; but their timidity was drowned in the general ferocity, and the very fear that put them into a minority on the occasion prevented them from asserting the good reasons they had for being so.

"Very good, my men," added Dolan. "I see that we are all of one mind. Martin, ahoy!"

"Ay, sir!"

"Can you get her out of this light that comes from I don't know where?"

"It comes from the Spray, sir!"

"Keep her clear of it if you can."

"There's only one way."

"Then take that way."

"You had better hear it, Captain Dolan, first. I have seen this sort of light before, and the only way to get out of it is to steer so close to the vessel carrying it that they can't depress, it low enough to reach you. Then it passes over you and you are all in the dark."

There was a dead silence at these words, and Captain Dolan evidently shrank from such a mode of dispensing with the ray of light that fell upon the Rift from the optical apparatus on board the Spray.

Martin spoke again:

"If that's done they can't see you a bit, for their own light so dazzles them you might get alongside of 'em and they do not know it, which just—you see, Captain Dolan, and you, shipmates—goes to show that there's two ways of looking at everything."

It was Ben Bowline who then said:

"I'm for going in and giving them a shot or two!"

"And I—and I!" cried several of the crew.

Dolan's face grew paler still.

"I don't know," he said, "what to say to it. But if you really wish it—"

"We do! we do!"

Martin did not wait for orders, but altering the course of the vessel he put her on a long tack away from the coast. The circle of light fell on the water and the Rift was clear of it on the moment.

"Now, boy," said Dolan; "you shall fire the gun?"

"Never! never!" cried Gerald. "I deny all that you have said against me, and I will not fire the gun

"'Will not' is a brave word. We shall see! Ah! not yet clear?"

"Oh, dear no!" said Martin, as the circle of light again fell on the vessel, after dodging about the sea for a few moments in search of it. "We must steer in a good bit closer before we get under it!"

Again the cutter cleared the light for a few minutes; and a gun fired from the Spray did no damage whatever to the Rift.

"Clear the gun!" said Dolan.

All was ready. By the side of the long twelve-pounder a man stood, with a smouldering port-fire and pole; but, with his lips compressed, Gerald—held tightly by the arms by two of the crew—was dragged close to the little piece of ordnance.

"I will not—I will not!" he said. "Dolan—you who I have called father, but will never call father again—I once more appeal to you. It will be no good. It is not my act; you may say of me what you like, but I will not fire the gun. Release me, you men who know and feel that it can avail nothing to force any one to an act from which his mind revolts! I will not fire the gun!"

"Now, listen all," said Dolan. "You see me here and you see my boy—my own boy. I am going to do two things; I am going to give you all the greatest proof in the world of my good faith to you by making my son one of yoy; and I am going to make him fire the gun as a punishment for the letter he wrote to the port admiral—"

"It is false!" cried Gerald.

"Stop his mouth if he speaks again! I say I am going to make him fire the gun at the Spray, so that if any misfortune should happen to come over us—which the Fates forbid—but if it should—you will all be able to say that it was Gerald, the captain's own son, who had fired the gun at the king's ship!"

"Ay, ay!"

"That's what I want you all to feel and understand, and now when I step aside make him fire it!"

"You cannot make me!" said Gerald.

"We will tend to that," cried one. "Here Bill, give me a hold of the port fire!"

"There you are!"

"Now, captain, you point the gun; he will fire it!"

"No, no!" said Gerald.

The boy did not know exactly how he was to be made to commit the act, from which he shrank with horror and a determination to die rather than be compelled to do it; but when that man seized him by the arm and began to lash the port-fire to it, he made all the struggle he could to be free.

It was wonderful then to see how—although in the grasp of these powerful men—Gerald, light and slender as he was, fought for freedom.

"Hit the young cub on the head," cried one.

"No, no!" said Dolan, "not for worlds. Only make him fire the gun. I will point it—not too close in, Martin."

"All right."

The cutter had made two tacks and was apparently now standing out to sea, with the schooner on its starboard bow. The people on board the Spray were evidently baffled and hardly knew where to look for their slippery and agile antagonist. The light from the lens was shifted about over the sea, but the cutter was fairly within its area and so escaped the beam of light.

The struggle on the deck of the Rift was great, for Gerald still fought with the sailors. Captain Dolan pointed the gun at the Spray, which was not difficult to see, making all the sail it could northward and surrounded by the halo of the light with which it intended to fix the position of the Rift.

"Now!" he said.

"Help! help! Schooner, ahoy!" shouted Gerald.

"Gag him!" roared Captain Dolan.

"Schooner, ahoy! Help!"

A twisted handkerchief was on the instant thrust into his mouth, and tied behind his head. The port-fire was securely fastened to his right arm, and by main force that arm was depressed toward the touch-hole of the gun.

"Now for it!" said Dolan. "Make him—make him fire it! Steady there; no matter if it hit or not, he still will have fired the first gun."

Gerald felt his face dashed forward, almost to touching the gun, but he still kept the port-fire from touching the priming with his utmost strength. The gag that was in his mouth prevented him now from crying out for help, and no doubt, in another moment, he would have been compelled to fire the gun, when, with a loud voice, Martin called out:

"A boat on the starboard bow!—an armed boat from the Spray on the starboard bow!"

"Boarders!" sang out Ben Bownline. "Repel boarders, my men, or you are all taken!"

These alarming sounds fell on the ears of the crew of the Rift like a trumpet call to battle. It was their liberties and perchance their lives that now were in the most imminent danger. Gerald, the gun, the letter to the port admiral—all were forgotten in the moment of intense anxiety to answer to the call of Ben Bowline.

Hand-spikes, hatchets, cutlasses and every offensive weapon that could be laid hold of at the moment was seized upon and a rush was made to the starboard bulwarks.

"Keep on, Martin," said Ben Bowline.

"Aye, aye!"

"Cutter, ahoy!" sang out a voice, as if from the water. "Cutter, ahoy! Surrender to his majesty's schooner Spray or we will blow you out of the water."

Captain Dolan said not a word, but held on to the cordage and shook in every limb, so that it devolved on Ben Bowline to make the reply, which was done in the response of:

"Blow away!"

"Mind what you are about!" said the voice from the boat. "We take you as smugglers—it may be worse. Resist and we sink you."

"Sink away," said Ben.

"Pull in, my men—board her! Hurrah! Make short work of her!"

The boat's crew raised a cheer and in a few seconds the boat was on the starboard quarter of the Rift.

"Now!" said Ben Bowline.

There was a crashing sound and he and Jackson and two more of the crew of the Rift let fall into the boat a heavy iron anvil, which was as much as they could all do to lift and tilt over the side.

The botton of the Spray's boat went all to pieces on the instant and the eight men that had been in it with Mr. Green were struggling in the water.

"Give way, Martin," cried Ben. "That's it."

The slight shift of the helm of the cutter brought her more on the wind, and she swept over the spot on which the boat of Spray had been swamped.

There was a wailing cry and then one voice cried, aloud:

"Cutter, ahoy! Pick us up!"

Captain Dolan—who, when he found what had happened, at once recovered his condition—replied by a recommendation for the speaker to go to a place known in a sailor's vocabulary as Davy Jones's locker and then he sang out:

"Schooner, ahoy! Schooner there on the starboard bow, ahoy!"

"Hilloa!" was the response. "Is that you, Mr. Green?"

"No, it's Brown—another, that's all. Good night."

Captain Dolan had mounted on the coil of the forecastle to hail the schooner, and at this moment a stunning report came in his ears, and, by the reel that the cutter gave he was thrown from his position and rolled head over heels down the forecastle hatch.

"That will do," said Ben, who had taken the opportunity himself of firing the twelve pounder—as, by the movement of the two vessels, he saw that he could get a good shot at the Spray

The shot hit her mast and brought down with a run a good portion of her upper gear and canvas.

"That's it!" said Martin. "Now, on we goes again, Ben."

"Ay, ay, Bo—so we do, and no great harm done!"

The Rift flew before the wind and the distance between the two rapidly increased.

"Off with you, boy!" whispered Ben to Gerald. "Below with you! The skipper won't ask for you yet awhile."

"Where is he?"

"Broke his neck, I shouldn't wonder."

"Broke his neck? How? Where?"

"Why, I saw him go, anyhow, down the forecastle hatch just now! So you be off while you can!"

"Ben!"

Gerald laid both his hands on the broad breast of the smuggler and spoke with deep emotion.

"Well, what is it?"

"I did not write to the port admiral. I did not—by word, or act, or thought—ever betray the Rift."

"That'll do. I never thought you did.

"Thank you, Ben."

"Go below at once and count on me and old Martin—for I will tell him what you say and what I think; and I rather take it, that is what he thinks, too."

Gerald pressed the hand of Ben for a moment and then at once dived down into the cabin.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Brave Bear Hunters.

This is the season for bear stories, and the following, vouched for by a gentleman from the Gatineau, is correct in every particular: A few days ago a party of Ottawa youths started up the Gatineau for the purpose of hunting. Unlike a great many others they had more of the sport than they wanted, and returned to Ottawa with enough to last them for some time to come. On reaching their hunting ground they repaired to the country store to purchase supplies. There they found a very excited Frenchman who was buying powder and ball, and who seemed in a great hurry to get away. The young men learned that the habitant, who lived only a few miles back, had been chased by a she bear and her two cubs. Here was a grand chance to distinguish themselves, and they started off to help the Frenchman slay the bear. In due course the oat field was reached and the bear tracked into the neighboring bush. The party separated so as to outflank and if possible surround the enemy. Then the bear took it into her head to have a little sport too, and commenced stalking one of the hunters. That young man wanted a bear in the worst way, but he did not want one that weighed more than one hundred and fifty pounds, while the one that was coming down on him would tip the beam at four hundred. It was evidently not the bear he was looking for, and so he started off to climb a tree and thus obtain a better view of the surrounding country and perhaps a glimpse of the bear he wanted. Strange to say two others of the party took the same method of finding their bears. At last the habitant shot the old bear, leaving the cubs to the other sportsmen.

European Armaments.

Europe has been well described recently as "bending beneath the crushing weight of her armor." Certainly, as we look from one European nation to the other, and observe the military armaments which each of them feels obliged to maintain, we may well believe the burden to be one a most too difficult for the several nations to support.

Each nation stands in jealous array, armed to the teeth, in the expectation or fear of a conflict, in which it might have to be the aggressor on the one hand, or, on the other, to defend itself from assault.

A recent article gave the figures of the German and French armies respectively, as they stand on a peace and on a war footing. It appears therefrom that it is possible for each of these powers, in case of war, to put an army of two and a half million of drilled soldiers into the field.

The armies of the other great powers—Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Great Britain—are smaller, but, if not compared with those of Germany and France, they still appear colossal. Russia supports nearly eight hundred thousand soldiers in time of peace, and could put two million three hundred thousand into the field were hostilities to break out.

Austria-Hungary has a peace armament of about three hundred thousand men, and a force of a little over a million for warlike purposes. Italy keeps only about one hundred and seventy thousand men with the colors, although what is known as the "permanent army" numbers more than seven hundred thousand.

Great Britain provides for an army, exclusive of the forces employed in India, of one hundred and forty thousand officers and men. If, however, Great Britain were to be involved in war, her army could be swelled by the reserves, militia and volunteers to a body of half a million of men.

Thirteen Great Mistakes.

To yield to immaterial trifles.

To look for perfection in our own actions.

To endeavor to mould all dispositions alike.

To expect uniformity of opinion in this world.

To measure the enjoyment of others by our own.

To expect to be able to understand everything.

To believe only what our finite minds can grasp.

To look for judgment and experience in youth.

Not to make allowances for the infirmities of others.

To worry ourselves and others with what can not be remedied.

To consider everything impossible that we can not perform.

Not to alleviate all that needs alleviation as far as lies in our power.

It is a great mistake to set up your own standard of right and wrong and judge people accordingly.

Make the best use of what you have rather than make your life miserable by wishing for what you have not.

There was a big time "so I hear among about half-a-dozen residents and others last Wednesday evening. A nicely wrapped up parcel of "ever-be-joyful" was seen procured in the early evening and as the time wore on it was freely imbibed, but it did not agree with some it appeared. Later on, however they paid a visit to one of our merchants and tried to get some eatables; but the hostess had retired and would not get up so nine hosts had to prepare the beef, potatoes, &c himself and, some sitting on the floor, and, some otherwise, they partook heartily, about fifteen pounds of the beef being consumed, so the story goes. When they all got home I can't say.

Dr. Christoe occupied the pulpit in the Methodist Church here on Sabbath morning last. Professor Morgan and little daughter Fairy spending the Sabbath in our village, were invited to sing at the evening service in the Methodist Church; this being made known before the hour of service the church was crowded and filled to its utmost seating capacity. The Rev. Mr. Ayers preached a short and very interesting sermon entitled "what good do I receive from being a christian" the sermon throughout was replete with practical truth; during the service Fairy and Professor Morgan sang two Solos each and a Duet; the audience were charmed with the sweet music. Mr. Elliott's Letter.

Mr. Editor,—For reasons I need not name, I with great reluctance, notice Mr. Elliott's protix, and to a considerable extent, irrevalent, letter—and but for its notable contortions, and incidental accomplices,—no reply would be necessary—perhaps it is not generally known that the "Union Standard" of Thornbury and Bob Myles, have been playing the same game, and appealed to the Ex-Deputy Reeve of Artemesia, for advice—hence, I have the transparent, lovely triplet Elliott: Miles and Farwell, to do, what any honorable person disdains—What evidently gives point to Elliott's extraordinary, production: is his recent, defeat, he illy brooks its crushing effect, and is out of sorts, because the Township thinks less of Him than he thinks of himself—The Reeve's chair has been his ambition, for years—and if by any means he could damage, his character, he seems to be anybody's humble servant—But I shall show he has written without counting the cost—He says, the "celebrated letter" "was written by me, as a public one"—of which, however, I have no knowledge—The letter was a sesled one—it was addressed to A. Elliott only—simply one councillor to another—it contained allusions to a conversation with a third party and which "pinched" as he alleges—it contained no authority, for inspection or transference to a third party. It contained certain promises, or obligations from myself—viz. to support a motion in Council, for "a grant"—the grant had been previously spoken of, in his presence at the Council board. viz. $100—But for reasons, directly to be mentioned. this innocent Deputy—requires "special marks"—to denotate privacy. The Council remembers, and he remembers, that in his presence, the Reeve, spoke of and explained thoroughly, regarding, this communication adressed to him—Then it was a private letter to all intents and purposes—no one thought of it in any other aspect—Would'nt a considerate councillor, have seized the opportunity, to impress his confreres of its import, and possible results? and in the face of his allegements, is he not guilty of gross dereliction? and if such grave consequences were impending—should he not have introduced a motion, to meet Euphrasia in her expenditure? But far from this, he did not inform us, that he was a party in letting the work—so understood by Myles—that he Elliott inspected it and gave interm certificates on Euphrasia for payments—which was first learned by the writer so late as the trial at Owen Sound. Why were not interm certificates issued against Artemesia, if so be, as stoutly argued—my letter made Artemesia equally liable? What rational person—whatever might have been the necessities—would have assumed so large an undertaking without the usual authority? All the intimation, all the authority, consisted in one solitary and ominous sentence, "they are going on with that work." not we—no joint action asked. And notwithstanding it was in hand for months—and this representative Councillor supervising it no further information was received—until the notable bill for the work, he had been directing, was placed upon the Council table—One would have thought now that a little manliness would have been displayed! not a bit of it—Every member, cried shame, at the unreasonable expenditure—And my good man went for repudiation, with the rest of us—no motion, nothing to vindicate his subsequent actions was attempted by him. Up to this point, he evidently was in harmony with his confreres—but a change occurs—Euphrasia is sued—The opportune time has arisen, for defamation and treachery—the private letter has become a public one—the hand of the traitor is seen and contrary to every thing honorable; my letter is found passed, to do service against the Council and myself—and to climax, the Doctors rascality, with sinister motives of the most hedious character, he says the Dr. swore that he did not sign the letter as Reeve—and at same time suppressed, willfully, the fact, that the lapsus, was rectified there and then and the letter acknowledged in its entirety. I confess I can find no words equal to the, infamous and open attempt at the Township's chief officer's character. Which lie for previous, personal favors, should have defended. Not enabled to point his finger to any Municipal irregularity or default—to hide his own, defects in the matter under discussion, and so prominently set forth; he resorts to meanness and deception to fasten the blunders of him and his accomplices on myself—How far he succeeds, the people can judge—in conclusion, let me say the ruling of the judge, made it clear that they acted injudiciously—in opperating without authority and procured no weight in this case at court as those who were there, well know—Mr. E. disingeniously suppresses the Judges ruling, for to mention it—would be to exonerate myself and Council; and show his situation and arguments completely abortive—In one sense I sincerely regret this episode—I have treated him always courteously—forgave much—but, I am bound to sustain and vindicate my character at all hazards.

Dr. Christie.

Our Forests the Great Assistant to Fertility.

To the Editor of the Standard.

Sir,—I should like to address a few words to your readers on a very important subject—that of the relation of forests, woods, or even of lines of trees to the fertility of the adjacent land. It has been thoroughly observed and is a matter of history that those countries such as Syria, Spain, parts of Italy and France, and many another where forested land was altogether or chiefly deprived of its trees, grew less and less fertile, some portions becoming altogether barren. And this being observed, some of these, by replanting, are now, after about fifty years of gradual improvement, becoming fertile again.

The reasons are these. Where a country is deprived of its trees, rain falling, passes away at once over the surface in torrents carrying with it much of the best soil to the lakes and rivers. Where woods abound, moisture is held for a long period, passing gradually away in creeks, water courses and the numerous underground channels of the earth, thus preserving the ground its great assistant to growth—its natural moisture.

Where, too, there is no shelter from rapid winds, ground dries out very quickly, and thus loses the benefit of such rains as may have fallen much sooner than, with shelter, would have been the case.

There is, too, another and very important cause. The presence of woods tends so to distribute the yearly rainfall, as to give, during the growing season, many refreshing showers—showers which would otherwise have added their amount to the heavy rains of spring and summer which are of course, not so valuable.

These reasons have given foundations for the statement made by those who have considered the subject that a country one-third or even one-fourth in woods will give more crops with less labor than one totally cleared. I would suggest that it should be the endeavour of every one to keep some portion of forest on his farm. To do this, it will be found of very great assistance to exclude cattle. If necessary a portion of woods may be reserved for them, but not the portion it is intended should remain in permanent forest. To keep a piece of wood in good reproductive condition, it should retain its soft leaf-bed over the ground, and should have a great many young trees springing up in all directions ready to replace the older ones in time, and in the meanwhile, to prevent the forest bed drying up and getting into grass, and to shade the trunks of the larger trees from sun and wind. Both of these objects, cattle if allowed admittance, will destroy they will trample and harden the leaf-bed and destroy the young trees. I would also recommend the planting of lines of evergreen trees along the exposed sides of a farm—say the north and west. These have proved of very great service in protecting the fall wheat and clover in winter, by diminishing the drifting of snow, and have also been of much assistance in giving shelter from wind both in winter and summer. Evergreens are easily propogated if planted in the last week in May or the first in June, and care taken to keep the roots covered and moist betwsen digging and planting.

Yours, &c.,
R. W. Phipps.

HOUSEHOLD.

Furnishing a Stylish Dining-Room.

We protest on many grounds against covering a room all over with carpet and nailing it close into the corners and recesses. It harbors dirt which can never be thoroughly swept out, and it renders the process of taking up the carpets unnecessarily troublesome and expensive, so that they are left down for, perhaps, a year or two, whereas it would be conducive to health if they were shaken more frequently.

A margin of not less than fifteen inches (eighteen inches or two feet is better) will not contract the apparent size of your room very materially, and you can then have a square or oblong carpet, with a border, either made in one, as a Turkey or Axminster carpet, or seamed up as in a Brussels.

A Turkey carpet should not be so large as to go under the furniture, but should clear of it. With Brussels it does not greatly signify, as the substance is much thinner.

Brussels carpet is, without doubt, the cheapest and best wearing for ordinary purposes, though for a dining-room a good Turkey carpet will prove in the long run an economical investment; and the difference to the tread is so great that if once we get accustomed to it a Brussels carpet henceforth loses it charm.

Nevertheless, very excellent patterns are now made in the English Brussels and pile carpets, with suitable borders, and these are not a bad substitute when cleverly put together for a seamless carpet.

From an art point of view a carpet cannot be treated otherwise than as a background to the furniture, quite as much, if not more, than the walls, excepting in a room where no furniture is, where alone we could tolerate those gorgeous Ambusson carpets (looking like a magnificent desert-plate), with a large expanse of white ground and bouquets, wreaths, baskets, and what not in the centre and borders.

Indian and Persian carpet weavers are still our masters and teachers in the art of combining colors, so as to form one harmonious plateau of bloom. We do not, however, object to a pattern being in some degree marked and obvious or to a geometric design, if not too hard, but avoid a carpet where the lines or patterns cut it up into detached fragments and spaces, destroying all sense of unity and breadth, which in a dining-room are specially desirable qualities.

The border is sometimes better for being clearly marked off from the centre carpet instead of flowing into it.

The window or windows, as the case may be next claim attention. Ordinarily a small, neat brass rod or pole, with simple spherical ends, is a rational and effective termination to the window-curtains, proclaiming its use and giving a quiet brilliancy where the light often strikes least.

Singular fancies have been perpetrated in the matter of cornice-pole ends, but the strange hallucination that bunches of tin grapes are the natural product of a rigid brass pole has by this time, we hope, been exploded. The thin brass stamped cornice is also a flimsy and unworthy contrivance and produces unpleasant sensations, similar to those evoked by the contemplation of conspicuously false jewelry.

Light wooden poles, to match the furniture in color or black, with very little gold or color (say Indian red or vermilion) introduced, are suitable. A gilt cornice in a dining-room is equally out of place with the gilt chimney glass. A wood cornice picked out with gilding is better.

Tested Receipts.

SEASONING FOR SAUSAGE MEAT.—One teaspoon and a half of salt, one of pepper and three of sage, thoroughly mixed. This is sufficient for one pound of meat cut fine, and is always just right.

POTATO BALLS.—Mix five or six mashed potatoes with the yolk of an egg, roll them into balls, roll in a beaten egg, then in bread-crumbs, and drop into boiling lard deep enough to float them.

CHICKEN PIE.—Take one good fat chicken, cut up, season, boil till done, then take two-thirds of a quart of thick sour cream, a little salt, one tablespoonful of butter, make a thick batter, quite thick, take a tin milk pan, put in a layer of chicken and then a layer of batter, also a few slices of butter, till your pan is full, then pour the juice the chicken was cooked in over the pan. Put in oven and bake till done.

CLEAR GAME SOUP.—Take the remnants of any kind of game not high; put them into a saucepan with an onion, a carrot, two or three cloves, a small piece of mace, a bay-leaf, some parsley, whole pepper, and salt to taste. Cover the whole with veal or poultry stock, and set the saucepan to boil gently for a couple of hours. Strain off the soup and set it to boil again, then throw in an ounce of raw beef or liver coarsely chopped; let it give one boil, then strain the soup through a napkin. If not quite clear, the clarifying process must be repeated. A very small quantity of sherry may be put in before clarifying.

STUFFED GREEN PEPPERS.—Take large green peppers, wash them and cut two-thirds around the stem and remove all seeds. Making a stuffing of two quarts of chopped cabbage, half a cupful of grated horseradish, three tablespoonfuls of celery seed, one cupful of mustard seed, and two tablespoonfuls of salt. Fill the peppers with the mixture, putting into each pepper one cucumber and one small onion; replace the stem and fasten it with a string. Put the peppers in a large unglazed jar, cover them with cold vinegar, and place a muslin bag with a thin layer of mustard seed over the top before adjusting the cover and keep in a cool place.

BISCUIT PUDDING.—Crumb in a pan three or four nice biscuits; pour over them a teacup of hot water and leave to steam until you are ready for them. Then mash very fine; beat the whites of three eggs, add a small lump of butter, three heavy spoons of light sugar and a teacup or more of sweet milk; heat well, add to the well-mashed biscuit, flavor with nutmeg, and bake. Beat the whites to a stiff froth—a pinch of salt added will insure a froth—and add a spoonful of light sugar. Spread over the pudding, when done, a coating of jelly. Over this spread the whites and brown very slightly. If liked the butter and jelly can be omitted and the whites and yolks of eggs be beaten together.

BEEF AND TOMATO PIE.—Take half a pound of beef-steak, six ripe tomatoes, one large onion, some thin slices of bread, about an ounce of butter or beef dripping, one pint of broth or stock, and seasonings to taste. Soak the bread in the stock, grease a pie-dish, and lay in half of the bread—sufficient to cover the bottom and sides. Cut the beef in small pieces, skin the tomatoes, and chop the onion; lay half of the tomatoes on the bread, next the beef, sprinkle over the chopped onion, and seasonings to taste; then the rest of the tomatoes, and a very little stock; cover entirely with soaked bread, break a few pieces of butter or dripping over the top, and bake in a moderately hot oven for about three-quarters of an hour.

SCIENCE.

In the British town of Kimberley, in South Africa, the current used for electric lighting also does duty as a ready means of killing stray dogs. How would it do to try the same experiment in Toronto.

A vulcanizing process, by which rubber is said to be made as hard, smooth and white as celluloid without the use of camphor, has been patented by a Long Island City inventor, who has leased buildings for a factory.

A Hanoverian physician, Dr. Brandes, has found reason for believing that malaria is checked by growths of anarachis al inastrum, a somewhat troublesome water-plant from Canada, and he recommends the introduction of this plant into marshy districts.

A new and plausible explanation of the destructive fires occurring in pine forests is offered. The pine resin exuding from the trees is often of lens shape, and before it thoroughly hardens frequently of crystalline clearness. It is surmised that while in that condition a resin lens may focus the sun's rays upon some light twig or resinous point and so start a blaze that quickly eats up a forest.

In the Swiss village of Meyrin some disused wells have been hermetically sealed to serve as barometers. On a fall of atmospheric pressure, air escapes through a small hole in the well-cover, blowing a whistle, and thus giving warning of a coming storm; put when the outside pressure is increasing, the air being forced into the well causes a different sound, and announces the probability of fine weather.

Dr. W. J. Graham, who has been pursuing prolonged investigations of the alkali which is more or less abundant on our western prairies, states that the basis of the alkali is common salt, derived from a rock salt formation underlying the region; and by permeation to the surface it there undergoes the chemical reactions which give it its apparent form and composition. He believes that the alkali will afford a valuable and really inexhaustible fertilizing material.

The insulating substance coating the Waring wires is the one subject about which the inventor maintains a mysterios silence. He claims that it is much superior to gutta percha, its insulation in short, being upwards of 200 megohms per mile. What in the name of sense is a megohm? the reader will ask. Well, the "ohm" without the "meg" is the standard unit which measures the force with which a substance resists the passage of electricity through it. The single ohm is about equal to the resistance offered by a piece of pure copper wire 250 feet long and 1-20 of an inch thick. Megohm is a great ohm or a million ohms. Now you know. In New York city there are so many wires over head that the resulting electric currents are said to interfere seriously with the correct running of watches. The air is full of electricity.

One great trouble in putting telegraph and telephone wires under ground is the difficulty of insulating them. In spite of utmost precautions and coating with extra tubing, the electric current from one will skip through the interventing air to another and confuse messages. It is doubtful indeed if there is any substance altogether non-conductive.

A Pittsburg inventor, however, believes he has a scheme for practically perfect insulation. His invention is given to the public through an electric manufacturing company of that city. By his plan he claims that telephone, telegraph and electric light wires may be placed underground without detriment to the clearness of the messages.

The method whereby electricity passes through the air from one wire to another is called induction. This induction is as active above ground as under, with the difference that in trenches dug beneath the earth's surface the bundles of wire are necessarily nearer together than in the air, and the force of induction is stronger.

Millions In It.

A despatch from Tahleguah, Indian Territory, says that the greatest wild pigeon roost in the United States is just now located about 20 miles north of there. The trees covering a mile square of timbered land are literally as full as the limbs will bear at night with these birds. Millions of pigeons are there, and when they come in to roost they make a noise like mighty thunder. Birdmen say there are only two flocks of wild pigeons now in North America. This is the larger one. A great many people are encamped around the roost engaged in trapping, netting, and killing them for shipment, which they are doing by the thousands. New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis and other places in the States of less note, are represented at this roost. For dead ones the slayers get an average of $2 per 100; for live ones the netters get $4 to $6 a hundred, as a great many of these are used in the East and ordered for shooting matches by sporting clubs. The nets are placed at some point where a bunch water, and sometimes as many as forty dozen are caught in one fly of the net. This makes several years in succession these birds have come to this place to roost, after nesting and summering away up among the lakes of Minnesota and adjoining country. A great many Indians are making from $2 to $3 a day in the pigeon business, while the speculators and shippers from the cities are making from $20 to $25 daily when they have anything like luck.

FARM.

A little milk and meal will keep the calf growing.

The best butter is worked the least. Dough may need kneading, but butter needs it not.

Sons and daughters are the most valuable products of the farm. Treat them accordingly.

The influx of grain into the cities of Minnesota and Dakota is so great as to cause a blockade.

It is claimed that the world's supply of wheat is shorter than the average, and that prices will be higher.

Wash the work horses' necks with salt and water morning and evening. It hardens the skin and prevents galling.

The largest peach orchard in the world is that of Mr. J. D. Cunningham, Orchard Hill, Ga. It contains 84,000 trees and occupies 790 acres.

In Europe farmers prefer to keep sheep for wool on soils containing lime, as they say on such soils the quality of wool is better.

A ton of forest leaves on a garden in Autumn to remain through Winter is worth much more than a ton of the best barnyard manure.

The man who has not anything to boast of but his illustrious ancestors is like a potato—the only good belonging to him is underground.

The effect of stagnant water on cows is not different from its effect on human beings—malarial. It makes them feverish and causes them to give unwholesome milk.

There is a strong favor growing for the white breeds of poultry, as such fowls dress well for market, the pin feathers not showing as clearly as on black-plumaged birds.

A century plant at Auburn, N. Y., is thirty feet high and the stem is six inches thick at the base. It has thirty-two flowering branches, with over five thousand buds and flowers. It is about sixty years old.

The eleven greatest dairy states, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri and Kansas. had, as shown by the last census, 7,524,643 cows used in dairying.

Better dispose of honey as it comes in at a fair price, than wait for better market and run all sorts of risks of losing or injuring the honey. Keeping the market full of old stock does much to destroy the demand for any kind of honey.

The number of fruit trees in California is given as follows: Apple, 2,700,000; peach, 1,200,000; pear, 500,000; plum and prune, 600,000; cherry, 400,000; apricot, 400,000; orange, 1,000,000; lime and lemon, 500,000. It is estimated that there are 70,000 acres of grapevines.

A gentleman writing from South Wales to Mr. Gilchrist, Fishery Inspector, Port Hope, says he has thoroughly acclimated some wild rice, sent by that gentleman from Canada and Mr. Gilchrist has a quantity of highest grade seed now on hand. His advertisement will be found on another page.

W. P. Elliott, of Moberly, Mo., owns a Jersey cow not yet five years old, that yielded 3224 pounds of milk in ninety days. Sixty days of that time three pints of the whole milk was furnished a neighbor, Mr. Elliott's family using cream the whole time, the remainder was churned and produced 127 pounds of gilt-edged butter.

No class of men are more in debt to their wives for the success that comes to them than are farmers. The wife and the mother who has the courage to go out with the husband of her choice and commence the struggle of life with him on the prairie, or on a new farm, with but little capital except of head and heart, is worthy to stand by the Spartan women on whom the poets have exhausted their words of praise.

A farmer sent a dollar for a lightning potota-bug killer which he saw advertised in a paper, and received by return mail two blocks of wood, with directions printed on them as follows: "Take this block, which is No. 1, in the right hand; place the bug on No. 2, and press them together. Remove the bug and proceed as before."

The United States signal office offers to send any farmer a hygrometer at cost ($7,) with a pamphlet containing directions for its use. Any one who studies it carefully and uses it intelligently will be able to get early information as to frosts. The gardener or vine-dresser, warned in time, may save a valuable crop. Could not our own meteorological office in Toronto do something of the same kind?

Oregon Deer Butchers.

According to the Portland Oregonian the business of killing deer for their skins is still carried on in that state as extensively as ever. In every direction in Coos, Curry and Jackson Counties the camps of these skin-hunters are found and around them are the carcasses of deer rotting on the ground. Two hunters will start out, each with a packhorse loaded with provisions for two weeks, and at the end of that time return with their horses laden with a hundred to a hundred and fifty deer skins. For these they get about fifty cents each. One of the worst features of this business is that, as the skins are thinner and better adapted for fine buckskin in the summer time than after the winter coat of hair has come out and the hide thickened, hundreds of does are shot before their fawns are sufficiently grown to take care of themselves. Fortunately there is no such extensive slaughter of deer in our own northern woods during the close season, t a little more of e abominable practice of hounding will soon drive them eyond the reach of both the dogs and their masters.

Orientals do not prepare coffee for drinking purposes as we do. Arabs make it from the unroastad beans. The Sultan of Turkey formerly, if not now, has a beverage made out of the dried pulp and pericape for his own use, while some of his subjects prepare a docoction from the dried leaves of the coffee tree. For this purpose the leaves are prepared by a process similar to that for tea leaves, and a great many suppose that the leaves so treated contain a larger proportion of caffeine than the beans.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"Up my way," began Brother Gardner, as the lamps were turned up, "libs a man whom I hev knowed fur a dozen y'ars as an honest, upright, hard-working citizen. He am kind to his wife, tender wid his children an' he would sell his boots to pay a debt. Dar' has bin no time in de last six or seben y'ars dat I wouldn't hev bin glad to lend him anything I had or to git up at midnight to do him a favor. De odder day he was put up as a candydate fur some small office. If it had bin on my ticket it would hev bin all right, but it was on de opposishun. As a consequence I hev bin goin' aroun' callin' him a liar an' a horse thief, an' warnin' my friends dat if he am 'lected dis kentry am gwine straight to ruin at once. I wouldn't lend him my ax or shovel to save his neck, an' I hev my suspishuns dat he beats his wife an' starves his children.

"In my feelins I am exactly like de rest of you. De candydates on my ticket are all right; de candydates on de odder am all wrong. Seriously, my frens, what fules we make of ourselves in pollyticks. We work 'longside of a man fur a y'ar—naybur wid his family—like his principles—admit his worth—stand ready to fight fur him, if necessary, but all of a sudden it comes out dat he am put up fur office. He am put up, probably, fur de werry merits we hev dis-kivered an' praised, but dat settles us. We am ready to abuse him high an' low, an' to stoop to de basest trickery an' dishonesty—to defeat him.

"Simple cases kin be seen all around us to-day. A man may differ wid us on poetry, religun, an' all else but pollyticks. De werry minit he can't go our candydates his goose am cooked. We say to ourselves when de campaign opens: 'Let us hope dat boaf parties will bring out deir werry best men. What we want am honesty an' respectability in official posishuns." Good men are hunted out an' prevailed upon to come to de front, an' den one party squars off to frow mud at one set, an' de odder party squars off to beslime de odder set. Men who hev lived fifty years of honest, upright lives am dragged frew de mud by loafers only six months out of Stait Prison, an' we stand ready to punch de head of our best friend in case he can't agree wid us. Am it any wonder dat American politics am a cess pool, an' dat Americans elected to represent counties, districts, States an' de gov'ment am looked upon wid suspishun by de world at large.

"I want to say to each an' ebery one of you dat de bigotry of pollyticks am de disgrace of the present generashun. A party must hev monumental cheek to argy dat it includes all de honest men in its ranks! A man must be leetle less dan a fool who reasons dat his way of thinkin' must guide all his friends! An' yit, dat am de prevailin' idea of to-day, an' good men am being slandered an' lied about an' dragged frew de mire simply bekase dey differ wid us on whether de gov'ment should pull on its right or its left bute first!

"I has heard some of dis talk around dis hall. I don't want to h'ar any mo' of it. Work fur whom you please an' vote fur whom you will, but doan' be idiot enough to ascribe to one all de varchews an' to charge de odder wid all the crimes on airth. We am all heah wid de same interests at heart—all luvin' our kentry an' all anxious to put her ahead. If we differ in our theory of how it should be done it am bekase no two men kin agree on de best way to git a baril o' cider down cellar."

OUT OF ORDER.

The Rev. Penstock sent to the Secretary's desk the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas, Sartin newspapers am in de habit of makin' a distinction in color when a man am arrested, as: "John Doe, a colered man, was arrested last night for'—and so forth, and

"Whereas, Dis distinction am a relic of barbarianism an' unworthy of de age, now darfore,

"Resolved, Dat dis club protest again sich distinction an' indulges in de hope dat it will soon be abandoned."

At the President's request it was read a second time, and then he arose and said:

"Brudder Penstock, I shall hev to declar' de resolushun outer order."

"Fur what reason, sah?"

"Fur de reason dat no vital ishue am at stake, an' bekase your pint am not well tooken. De fack of distinction of color am a pint in our favor. So many pussons am bein' arrested an' held up in de papers dat if de term 'cull'ed' was not used now an' den de hull caboodle would be supposed to belong to our race."

"I shall appeal from de decishun of de ch'ar," firmly replied Penstock.

"Werry well. De Seckretary will call de roll on de appeal."

This was done, and there were only three votes to sustain it. A vote was then taken on the resolution, and it received only two votes. Brother Penstock sat down very hard, and during the rest of the meeting employed his time in reading a patent medicine circular.

THANKS.

A communication from Halifax contained the information that a new schooner just launched there had been named "Brother Gardner" in honor of the President of the Lime-Kiln Club. The Secretary was instructed to return the thanks of the club in carmine ink, and to forward by the same mail a horse-chestnut, which Brother Gardner has carried in his pocket for the last fifteen years for luck.

IT WILL HAVE TO GO.

The committee of civil engineers appointed to make a survey of the stove and report its exact condition, now reported through its Chairman that they had discovered the following injuries:

Loss of two legs and a compound fracture of a third.

Two crevasses extending the entire length of the base, in an erratic manner.

One door hinge carried away by a tornado, the hearth broken in three places, and the door very much demoralized by a collision.

The port side cracked in five places and starboard in six, while the stern had been badly wrenched by getting aground. In their opinion Paradise Hall was in danger of being destroyed every time a fire was started in the stove. The committee was dismissed from further consideration on the subject, and Trustee Pullback and Whalebone Howker were appointed a new committee to look around and report prices on another stove.

Samuel Shin moved that they be instructed to buy one with an angel in bronze on the top, and that it should not be less than four-horse power, but he was promptly ordered down and fined $400, and the committee was left to use its own discretion.

Reports from the librarian and keeper of the museum were then submitted, and the meeting adjourned. The person who stole Sir Isaac Walpole's horn-handled umbrella was appealed to come forward and give it up and clear away the dark mystery enshrouding the affair, but he didn't come worth a cent.

Amazing Speed of the Pigeon.

The much-belauded steam engine, the motive powers of which have constantly to be tended and renewed, is but a poor contrivance by the side of the pigeon, which, with his self-contained mechanism, can not only travel at amazing speed, but can "stay" for an extraordinary period. The performance of the pigeons which lately flew from London to Brussels is astounding. They were loosed from their baskets, some 300 travelers in all, at 10:20 a. m. on Sunday, and they completed their journey of 180 miles within a minute of 4 o'clock, having flown the distance in five hours and forty-one minutes—that is to say, they went 360 half-miles in 340 minutes—more than a mile in two minutes, and this sustained for nearly six hours. It is to be assumed that they lost no distance and that they went the shortest way to Brussels; but it is reported that they encountered a severe storm on their passage, and every man who has battled against a high wind well understands what that means. It is obivious that in fair weather, to say nothing of what might have been done with a favorable breeze, very much better time could have been made. As it is the speed of these pigeons, kept up for 180 miles, is almost equal to the average time in which the winner of the Derby runs his race, and is superior to the time which some winners have made; it is, indeed, almost equal to the best record of a race-horse over a mile, that record being about 1:42; for no one now places the slightest faith in the legends of Eclipse and his mile a minute. The American trotting mare Maud S. has covered a mile in 2:08¾. The best time made by a man is George's 4:12¾; but it is the endurance of these pigeons that makes their work so wonderful. Migratory birds, of course, come infinitely greater distances, though it is necessarily impossible to estimate their speed.

The Land Laws of Japan.

The leading vernacular journals of Japan agree in regarding the recently issued regulations for the sale of land in Hokkaido as most important. A prominent purpose of these regulations is to prevent the purchase of large tracts by speculators who have no intention of engaging in agricultural pursuit, but merely contemplate holding land with the hope of a rise in its value. To obviate such speculation, the area purchasable by one person is now limited to 100,000 stubo, or about eighty acres, and it is also provided that official inspections shall be made annually with the view of determining whether the land is being applied to the purpose announced originally by its holder. All land not thus utilized will be resumed possession of by the Government. In addition the land will not become the actual property of its cultivator until after the expiration of ten years. During that time he will have the use of it rent free, and should his decade of experience prove attractive, the option of purchasing the fee simply for $1.20 per acre will then be given him. Thus the arrangement amounts to this—that any one intending, bona fide, to engage in agricultural pursuits can procure the free use of eighty acres of land, with the certainty of being able to buy in perpetuity, for $1.20 per acre. During those ten years he will be exempt from land or local taxes, but nothing is said about export taxes, which are the great incubus upon all industry in Hokkaido.

Capital Punishment by Electricity.

There is now being exhibited at Leipsic an apparatus for putting criminals to death by electricity. So long as it is found necessary to retain capital punishment on our statute books it may well be that the electric method is the most merciful and least repulsive process that could be devised for carrying the sentence into effect. But if such means are ever adopted in this country the details will certainly be carried out in the theatrical manner which commends itself to the Leipsic amateur. In this apparatus, behind the chair of which the condemned man is to take his seat—and by means of which, as we need not explain in detail, his body is placed in circuit with a powerful coil—there stands a conventional figure of Justice with bandaged eyes, holding the balance in her left hand and the sword in her right. The criminal having taken his seat, the proper functionary is supposed to read over the record of his crimes and the sentence of the law. This ceremony completed, he folds up the document and places it in the scale pan, the arm of the balance descends, closes the circuit and all is over.

The Agreement Not Suitable.

Bank President.—Now, it is understood, is it, that you are to act as cashier; are to have $2,500 as your yearly salary, and neither of us can terminate the arrangement without giving the other at least a month's notice of such desire?

Cashier.—Excuse me, but such an agreement would not be in the least agreeable to me.

President.—Is not the salary large enough to suit you? Because if it is not, we will try and make that satisfactory.

Cashier.—O, the salary is about right.

President.—What is the trouble?

Cashier.—I don't like the idea of giving you a month's notice of my intended departure. I might want to go at a moment's notice, and I do not want to bind myself to acquaint you with the fact a month beforehand.

The detractor may, and often does, pull down others, but he never, as he seems to suppose, elevates himself to their position. The most he can do is maliciously to tear from them the blessings which he cannot enjoy himself.

LATE DOMINION NEWS.

There have been twenty-seven deaths from measles at Beaver River and Lac La Ronge in the North-West.

The Calgary Council has decided to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings in the town limits for the future.

Captain Lorway says there is no truth in the reports that American seiners had been fishing inside the three mile limit in Asby Bay.

The North-West Council has passed a resolution asking the Dominion Government to build a double bridge across the South Saskatchewan.

The graves of the victims of the massacre at Frog Lake are reported to be all in good order, neatly sodded, and the crosses put up to mark them still standing.

The Peterboro' Grand Jury, in order to meet the ingenious tramp, has declared in favor of imposing hard labor on all prisoners confined in county gaols, whether the work undertaken be done at a profit or not.

An old married man at Dorchester, N. B., eloped with a young unmarried girl recently, and was pursued by his nephew, compelled to relinquish his easy-virtued companion, and to return to his wife and family.

An examination of several car loads of wheat that arrived at Winnipeg from Western Manitoba showed the grain to be so saturated with smoke blown into fields of standing grain from prairie fires as to give it a bad taste and render it utterly useless.

Fishery Inspector Rogers, of Halifax, has just received a letter from the Government of Sweden asking for plans and working models of his fishway with a view of its introduction into Sweden. Mr. Rogers is now in correspondence with the Governments of other foreign countries in connection with the same matter.

It is said that the appointment of a successor to the late Bishop of Saskatchewan rests with the Archbishop of Canterbury, there not being a sufficient number of self-supporting parishes in the diocese to enable the Synod to hold an election. The names of Dean Grisdale and Archdeacon Pinkham, of Winnipeg are prominently mentioned in connection with the vacancy.

A young man named Desrochers, eighteen years of age, while embarking in a canoe at St. Paul to go on a hunting expedition, pushing his seat moved the trigger of his gun either with his foot or with an oar. The gun was fired, and the charge lodged in his abdomen. Some of his friends who were near came instantly to his relief, but he died a few minutes later in great suffering.

Arrangements have been completed for the establishment in the North-West of a training farm for boys and girls from the homes of Dr. Barnardo in England and Eastern Canada. The farm will be situated at Portage, where a block of about five thousand acres has been secured. The erection of the necessary buildings will be proceeded with at once and the first party of boys brought out next Spring.

Mr. George J. Bliss, of Fredericton, N. B., who has actively opposed the introduction of ritualistic practices and innovations in Christ Church there, has taken an action for defamation of character against Rev. Montgomery, of Kingsclear, who is supposed to be the author of a letter in The Church Guardian, accusing Mr. Bliss of having got up a series of false charges against Rev. G. G. Roberts, the rector of Christ Church.

A vigorous agitation is in progress at St. John, N. B., against the proposed subsidizing of mail steamers making Portland the winter Canadian terminus. At a great meeting the other night resolutions were passed declaring that Portland be removed from the advertisements asking for tenders for carrying the ocean mails and St. John inserted, and that Canada's winter ports be St. John and Halifax. An influential delegation of St. John citizens will leave at once for Ottawa to press these claims upon the Government.

The New Brunswick Methodist Conference has determined to take the case of the Rev. Mr. Currie, charged with immoral conduct, to the Supreme Court at Ottawa. Much indignation is expressed by members of the Conference at the judgment of the New Brunswick Supreme Court, restraining the Conference from taking action in the matter, the judges were handled without gloves by several clergymen. Rev. Dr. Williams said that the Conference had determined to take the Court of New Brunswick should not stop the Methodist Church, and while the General Superintendent he would act on that policy.

A Sudbury correspondent tells us that the Canadian Copper Company have bought 160 acres for $65,000 besides Government lands. They employ 80 to 100 men, besides those constructing seven miles of railway, the same as the C. P. R. About 200 car loads of 100 lbs each have been shipped to the United States. Preparations for employing more are being made. The family of the owner is residing at Sudbury. An assay office is in successful operation. Stobie, Campbell, Eyre, and others have made claims, and experts from Montreal and New York have examined and reported favorably upon them.

At the Cobourg Assizes, Duncan A. Cumming and Thomas J. Browse were tried and found guilty of forging $20 notes on the Bank Valley Bank, and Cumming, Browse, and Abel Christensen pleaded guilty to forging $10 notes on the Merchants' Bank of Canada, to making plates of $10 Merchants' Bank notes, and to making plates of $50 notes on La Banque Ville Marie of Montreal. The Grand Jury in their presentment complimented Government Detective Rogers for the manner in which he had ferreted out the guilty parties and secured such strong cases against them. Cumming was sentenced to three years in the Penitentiary, Browse to two years and six months, and Christensen to two years.

Losing Votes.

"You can't git me to vote fer that man," said a farmer, referring to a statesman who had been taking in the country fair; "he's got much of a dood."

"How is he a dude?"

"He pernounces punkin with an 'm' and all."

The Candidate.

"Father, who travels the road so late?"
"Hush, my child, 'tis the candidate:
Fit example of human woes—
Early he comes and late he goes.
He greets the women with courtly grace,
He kisses the baby's dirty face,
He calls to the fence the farmer at work,
He bores the merchant, he bores the clerk,
The blacksmith, while his anvil rings
He greets, and this is the song he sings:

"Howdy, howdy, howdy-do?
How is your wife, and how are you?
Ah! it fits my fist as no other can,
The horny hand of the working man."

"Husband, who is that man at the gate?"
"Hush, my love, 'tis the candidate."
"Husband, why can't he work like you?"
"My dear, whenever a man is down,
No cash at home, no credit in town;
Too stupid to preach and too proud to beg,
Too timid to rob and too lazy to dig,
Then over his horse his legs he flings,
And to the dear people this song he sings:"

"Howdy, howdy, howdy-do?
How is your wife, and how are you?
Ah! it fits my fist as no other can,
The horny hand of the working man."

Brothers, who labor early and late,
Ask these things of the candidate:
What's his record? how does he stand
At home, no matter about his hand.
Be it hard or soft, so it be not prone
To close over money not his own.
Has he in view no thieving plan?
Is he honest and capable?—he is our man.
Cheer such a one till the welkin rings,
Join in the chorus when thus he sings:

"Howdy, howdy, howdy-do?
How is your wife, and how are you?
Ah! it fits my fist as no other can,
The horny hand of the working man."

That Line Fence.

Old Farmer Smith came home in a miff
From his field the other day,
While his sweet little wife, the pride of his life,
At her wheel was spinning away.

And ever and anon a gay little song
With the buzz of her wheel kept time;
And his wrathful brow is clearing now,
Under her cheerful rhyme.

"Come come, little Turk, put away your work,
And listen to what I say;
What can I do, but a quarrel brew
With the man across the way?

"I have built my fence, but he won't commence
To lay a single rail;
His cattle get in, and the feed gets thin—
I am tempted to make a sale!"

"Why, John, dear, John, how you do go on!
I'm afraid it will be as they say."
"No, no, little wife, I heard that strife
In a lawyer's hands don't pay.

"He is picking a flaw, to drive me to law—
I am told that he said he would—
And you know, long ago, law wronged me so,
I vowed that I never should.

So what can I do, that I will not rue
To the man across the way?"
"If that's what you want, I can help you haunt
That man with a sceptre gray.

"Thirty dollars will do to carry you through,
And then you have gained a neighbor,
It would cost you more to peep in the door
Of a court, and as much more labor.

"Just use your good sense—let's build him a fence
And shame had acts out of the fellow."
They built up his part, and sent to his heart
Love's dart where the good thoughts mellow.

That very night, by the candle light,
They opened with interest a letter;
Not a word was there, but three greenbacks fair
Said—the man was growing better.

A Young Wife's Views.

I think my husband ought to do
Exactly as I want him to,
Especially where it concerns
The money that for me he earns.

If he and I are one, why do
As if we were, and must be, two?
For if our interests combine,
What'er is his is also mine.

I hate to ask him every day
For little sums, and have him say,
"My dear, where has that dollar gone
I gave you only yestermorn?"

'Tis strange indeed how in his eyes
A sum will swell and swell in size
When once persuaded to resign
It from his pocket-book to mine.

He lets me run up heavy bills
At two big stores, and thus fulfills,
He thinks, his duties unto me;
But I with him do not agree.

I like to go from store to store
(As bees the fragrant buds explore),
And take from each whatever suits
In bonnet, mantle, gloves, or boots.

I think a "common drawer" would prove
A means to strengthen faith and love;
Or better still 'twould be were he
To bring his money all to me;

And safer. Then, too, he might learn
To ask a little in his turn,
And have a chance as well to see How very generous I would be!"

Babylon.

Her robes are of purple and scarlet,
And the kings have bent their knees
To the gemmed and jewelled harlot
Who sitteth on many seas;

They have drunk the abominations
Of her golden cup of shame;
She has drugged and debauched the nations
With the mystery of her name.

Her merchants have gathered riches
By the power of her wantonness,
And her usurers are as leeches
On the world's supreme distress.

She has scoured the sea as a spoiler;
Her mart is a robber's den,
With the wrested toil of the toiler,
And the mortgaged souls of men.

Her crimson flag is flying,
Where the east and west are one;
Her drums while the day is dying
Salute the rising sun.

She has scourged the weak and the lowly
And the just with an iron rod;
She is drunk with the blood of the holy—
She shall drink of the wrath of God!

Seasonable Adoration.

I.

I love to see the setting sun,
Sink splendidly from sight:
I love to watch, while one by one
The stars peep out at night.

II.

I love to view the forest gay
With brilliant autumnal hues;
I love to see the dawn of day,
The grass all gemmed with dews.

III.

I love the ocean great and grand,
That roars in rock bound caves;
I love to see the crinkled sand
Left bare by foamy waves.

IV.

All Nature's charms, in short, I love.
Her forests, fields and lakes;
But oh! all other things above love hot buckwheat cakes.

FROM THE LEVANT.

Visit of the Duke of Edinburgh and British Men-of-War.

A Beyrout, Syria, letter to the Hartford Courant says:—The English squadron of the Duke of Edinburgh, dropped anchor in St George's bay last Tuesday, the 24th Oct. The fleet consists of the flag ship Alexandra, the Dreadnought, the Thunderer, the Superb, the Temeraire, the Agamemnon, the Iris and torpedo ram Polyphemus. These ships, the most powerful in the English navy, have been cruising about the eastern Mediterranean since the blockade of Greece, and are now moving northward to the ports of Asia Minor. During their stop at Alexandria last week the Duke of Edinburgh was royally entertained, despite the ill-feeling resulting from the last bombardment.

As the squadron steamed around Ras Bey rout at daylight and swung around at anchor before the city the sight was impressive. At 8 o'clock the town was reminded of its visitors by the thunder of ordnance, which was feebly answered by the guns of the Turkish garrison, as the English flags ran up from the deck of each floating leviathan. All Beyrout seemed to rush to the water front to inspect the most powerful naval squadron afloat. In their eager curiosity hundreds put off in small boats to inspect the ships near at hand.

THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH

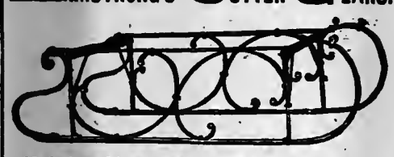
and nearly 200 officers arranged to visit Damascus. Messrs. Cook & Co. looked after the ways and means. Every mark of respect has been shown the Duke, and to-day, as your correspondent was riding to Beyrout from the mountains, he met large numbers of Lebanon soldiers mounted, who were on their way to escort the Duke to-morrow on his way from Damascus. The English vice-consul has arranged a reception for the officers at his summer house at Beit Mary on the Lebanons, three hours ride from the city. Few English and American houses on the mountains have been without a guest or two from the fleet.

No photograph or description can begin to give the full impression an English fleet makes upon the beholder. The fine article which appeared last winter in Harper's Magazine did all that words can do. But to pull out under the shadows of the great hulks and see the monstrous guns looking down upon you, gives a new and startling sensation. Concentrated power seems embodied in every line. In fact there is very little of beauty in the whole fleet. Only one ship, the Iris, is at all attractive, but this swift cruiser (making 18½ knots) is certainly a beautiful craft. She is a steel despatch boat, does not carry any heavy guns, and has only 1½ inch steel decks over the machinery, boilers and magazines.

All the other boats are positively ugly. Every other idea has surrendered to the desire for efficiency. The flagship, the Alexandra (named after England's future queen), is somewhat ornamented, but the effect is very far from pleasing. As one looks over the whole fleet he realizes that the old days of naval warfare are over—the wild, dashing days, when the ocean was made beautiful with the towering canvas of frigate and cutter, and when success depended quite as much on skill as on guns.

How Languages are Formed.

It has been a perplexity to scholars how such a vast variety of languages and dialects can have originated in our world, especially if they all grew out of one original tongue. Mr. Horatio Hale says in Science that the perplexity will be removed if scholars will look low enough, and take in children as well as adults.



He gives several striking cases of groups of children accustomed to play with each other, and left mostly to themselves, who formed langages which they used with perfect freedom and understood with ease, but which were quite unintelligible to others.

If children can do this in play, it would be a simple matter for adults, placed in an isolated position, and cut off from communication with the rest of the world, to make a new language for their own benefit.

Mr. Hale offers some substantial arguments to prove that language-speaking men have not existed in our world for more than seven thousand years. His article is worthy of a careful study of its original suggestions.

IMPOSSIBLE.
Once there was a maid whose beauty
Put to shame the choicest art,
Yet she'd shirk no household duty,
And she even had a heart.

O'er her face smiles chased each other
Like the sunbeams in the rose—
And she never let her mother
Sweep the steps or wash the clothes.

Every night the grand piano
Sang, responsive to the touch—
And this maid of charming manner,
Oft made bread and pies and such.

She was fair of form and feature
Diamonds paled beneath her glance;
Yet this handsome, dazzling creature
Used to mend her brother's pants.

I WONDER.
If North Grey is any safer to the party on account of Sir John's recent visit to Owen Sound.
If Reformers really despise him as much as they profess.
If they wouldn't be only too glad to have just such a leader.
What does party really amount to anyway, nowadays.
If a mock parliament would not succeed in Markdale.
Of course it wouldn't do to let Dr. Sproule or Wm. Brown into it.
They would gobble us all up.
How many Markdaleites visited the brewery while in Owen Sound on Monday week.
And felt big after it.

Proprietary Medicines.
A visit to Dr. Green's Laboratory, at Woodbury, N. J. has considerably changed our views, and especially our prejudices in regard to what are generally known as "Standard Patent Medicines." Of course we are getting to that age in life when we are forced to conclude Life itself is a humbug and naturally distruct anything that has not withstood long and tried experiences. Being a physican I had the curosity to know how such a sale of two medical preparations could be sustained for so many years. The perfect system upon which the business is conducted and the pharmaceutical arrangements for the manufacture of two recipts with which we were made acquainted, are sufficiently convincing to us that the AUGUST FLOWER, for Dyspepsia and Liver Complaint, and BOSCHEE'S GERMAN SYRUP, for Throat and Lung Troubles, were for the complaints they are recommended, most excellent remedies, and only regret that in much of our practice, medical ethics prevent us form prescribing them without making the formulas public. When we were shown the great quantity of voluntary letters having been forwarded Dr. Green, from all parts of the country, and from all classes of people, lawyers, ministers doctors, give a description of their ailments, testimonials of their cures, etc., I feel like endorsing Dr. Green's suggestion that the Government accept such valuable formulas, and license them for general use by giving protection to the inventor same as parents generally.—Copied from N. Y. Druggists' Circular of Oct., 1886.

WHAT TRUE MERIT WILL DO.
The unprecedented sale of Boschee's German Syrup within a few years, has astonished the world. It is without doubt the safest and best remedy ever discovered for the speedy and effectual cure of Coughs, Colds and the severest Lung troubles. It acts in an entirely different principle from the usual prescriptions given by Physicians, as it does not dry up the Cough and leave the diseas still in the system, but on the contrary removes the cause of the trouble, heals the part affected and leaves them in a purely healthy condition. A bottle kept in the house for use when the disease make their appearance, will save doctor's bills and a long spell of serious illness. A trial will convince you of these facts. It is positively sold by all druggists and general in the land. Price, 75 cts., large bottles. E. O. W.

IMPORTANT NEWS ITEM.

MR. A, DINSMORE, our enterprising Book Stationer and Fancy Goods Merchant has a very large and handsome stock now on sale. It would take a whole side of our paper to enumerate his thousand and one useful and fancy articles suitable for Christmas Presents and staple use. ECONOMY should be the watch word these times of small profits and keen competition. Retrenchment is necessary in all reasonable ways, but when it comes to dropping off the local paper, the item is so paltry, and only once a year, it is an act of economy which no one ever feels the better for, though he feels the want of its weekly visits very keenly.

HOW THEY WILL DO IT.—A lady door keeper, a lady to preside, ladies to give addresses and render the program throughout, lady waiters for the refreshments, and all young ladies at that. Where is all this going to be? Why at the young Ladies social in the Lecture room of the Methodist Church on Wednesday evening the 8th Dec. Only 15 cents to see it all. THE celebrated "Peak Sisters" will render some popular melodies during the evening. Refreshments served at 7:30. Come.

COLD BATH.—One day last week a little one belonging to a Markdale citizen fell into an open cistern. The opening was too small to admit a grown person and a young lad was let down by a rope and brought the youngster safe to its parent, who was by this time almost distracted. The little one, we are pleased to say, is none the worse for its cold bath.

Redeemed His Promise.

PART I.

"Franz, how about the Lyskamm to-morrow? The weather looks settled."

"The weather is good, Herr, but——"

"But what, Franz?"

"I do no like the Lyskamm."

"And why don't you like the Lyskamm, Franz?"

"Herr, there is a fearful cornice there this year."

"We'll take our chance of that. We can't tell what it's like till we try, and if we find it too bad we can always turn back. When must we start?"

"It will be time if we leave here at two."

"Good! Then you'll call us about one. Guten Abend, Franz."

"Guten Abend, Herr; schlafen Sie wohl."

The above conversation took place one exquisite August evening outside the old Riffel Hotel. Table d'hote was over, and the usual assemblage of climbers, guides, and others was there, watching the declining light of a most glorious sunset fading slowly away from the mighty precipices of the Matterhorn, and from the other summit of that, to my mind, the grandest range in all the Alps.

The season up to that time had not been a good one, and but little climbing had been done; but, with the prospect of fine weather, of which that morning had given unmistakable promise, every one took heart, and the number of expeditions that were at once planned for the following day was something astonishing.

Every available guide was "booked," and the courteous lady who at that time presided over the Riffel was at her wits' end to know where to accommodate all who asked that night for sleeping space. I myself was not a novice at climbing, having already spent several seasons in the Alps, and for some years I had been a member of the Alpine Club. I had been up most of the great peaks around Zermatt, but I had not yet ascended the Lyskamm, (14,888 feet,) and it was for the purpose of doing the Lyskamm that I had come up to the Riffel.

I was accompanied by a fellow-member of the Alpine Club named Burns, an admirable climber and a charming companion, and I had my guide Franz, who had been with me on most of my previous expeditions, and in whose steadiness and skill I had reason to have the greatest confidence. Franz was a man of forty or so, tall, and of splendid physique, with a good honest weatherbeaten countenance, to which a long mustache gave a somewhat military appearance.

In intelligence he was greatly superior to the ordinary run of guides, for he could talk well upon other subjects besides the one topic of mountains.

Burns and I, being in some favor with the authorities at the Riffel, were fortunate in getting a room to ourselves; but a score or so of travelers, for whom no other space could be found, had to repose as best they could on the floor of the salon, and lucky were they who could secure a mattress, for even mattresses gave out at last.

We turned in early; but as I can never sleep on the eve of an expedition, I was not sorry when Franz's knock, soon after one o'clock, warned us that it was time to be up. This getting up is, I think, the most disagreeable part of an expedition.

I have a particular objection to dressing in a bad light, feeling all the while only half awake, and—but low be it spoken—more than half disposed to envy those who are not leaving their beds at such an unearthly hour.

I dislike, too, the early breakfast—a melancholy meal, to be got over as expeditiously as possible; and on this point every one seems to be agreed, for at the Riffel, at all events, I have observed that it is usually dispatched in solemn silence. The very look of the sleepy servant who brings in the coffee exercises a depressing influence, as well it may.

Then there is that getting into boots (for I am not one of those inconsiderate individuals who puts his boots on up stairs and comes pounding down, to the detriment of sleep in those who do not happen to be getting up so early,) and boots, to begin with, feel hard, if not absolutely uncomfortable?

But, after all, what are these minor disagreeables beside the extraordinary amount of pleasure that is to be got out of climbing? They perhaps make it all the pleasanter if we did but know it.

We were rather earlier than the majority, but there were two or three sleepy-looking individuals in the breakfast-room, evidently novices bound for Monte Rosa, giving one the idea by their appearance that they were already beginning to think climbing a mistake rather than otherwise.

It was close upon two o'clock—the hour Franz had named—when we got off, and we were soon on our way toward the Gorner Glacier. The date was August 13, 187—.

Our party had received an addition in the shape of a porter whom Franz had engaged over night—a big, good-natured-looking fellow, and a very useful man to have on a rope, as we found subsequently.

The morning was splendid, and the stars shone down upon us from a cloudless sky, but still Franz seemed dissatisfied, and complained more than once of its feeling close. The atmosphere was certainly heavy, but as we neared the glacier there came toward us a breath of cold air deliciously refreshing and inspiriting.

It was still dark when we reached the ice, but before we had crossed the glacier the day had commenced to break, and behind the giant mass of Monte Rosa and the Lyskamm there came over the heavens that pale unearthly hue which is seen at times when snow and sky intermingle. It was a superlatively fine morning, and save for a few saffron-colored clouds floating above the Weisshorn the sky was perfectly clear.

We breakfasted near the well-known halting-place for parties making the ascent of Monte Rosa, and soon afterward we left that mountain on our left to keep on up the Grenz Glacier toward the summit of the Lysjoch.

It seemed certain now that we should have a fine day, but Franz was clearly ill at ease, and grumbled constantly about the heat in the night, saying that he feared that we should find the Lyskamm arete in bad condition.

His spirits, though, recovered somewhat as we got higher, and certainly the weather left little to be desired, for a flood of golden sunlight spread over rock and snow, till even the hollow of the glacier in which we stood became bathed in the glorious light. Indeed we could not have chosen a more perfect day for our expedition.

We made rapid progress, for we were what is known as a "fast" party, and while it was still early we reached the foot of the terrible arete, which rises straight up from the glacier till it culminates in the summit of the Lyskamm.

To my mind this arete constitutes one of the nastiest bits of climbing in the Alps. It is not difficult, but it is long, and almost its whole length dangerous. Its danger arises from the cornice, which in an immense mass hangs over on to the Italian side of the mountain. The actual ridge is so sharp, and on either side of the face of the cliff falls away so steeply to the glacier, that the greatest care is necessary in order to keep on the ridge itself without trespassing upon the cornice, which, being formed of frozen snow only, is liable to crumble away at the slightest touch. So deceptive is a cornice of this description that even good guides are at a loss to distinguish sometimes between what is safe and what is not, while to a novice what may appear to be one broad smooth surface of snow may be safe to tread upon only to the width of a few inches.

It is this difficulty of telling where the firm ground ends and where the cornice begins that constitutes the danger of the Lyskamm arete. More than once it has led to mistakes on the part of the guides, and it was such that caused one of the most awful tragedies that ever occurred to mountaineers—the fatal accident to Messrs. Lewis and Paterson's party in 1878. The Lyskamm by this route is emphatically not an ascent to be recommended.

Franz was ever celebrated for his caution, and on this day he exercised even more than his ordinary care. Not a step did he take without first testing the snow in front with the point of his ice-axe, so as to make sure of what was ahead, and he never moved forward until quite convinced that it was safe to do so.

Thus our progress was slow, and it was not til nearly eleven o'clock that we topped the final ridge and stood together upon the summit of the Lyskamm,

The view, exquisitely bright and clear as the sky was that day, was a marvelously beautiful one, but it is not within my province to describe it here, and, indeed, were I to make the attempt, I should fail to convey an idea of the impression it made upon me at the time. Besides, it was not for long that we were permitted to enjoy it, for Franz was all eagerness to be down the arete before it got much later.

We were soon on the rope again. Franz led, then I came, then Burns, and the porter—an admirable man for the purpose, on account of his weight and strength—brought up the rear. It was in this order that we commenced the descent

All went well at first. Each man was careful to use the rope as the rope ought to be used—that is, by keeping it taut between himself and his man in front. Franz moved downward carefully, and at each step sounded the snow with his axe as he had done on the way up. The position, in fact, was one which needed care.

Upon our left the face of the mountain fell sharply away to the glacier below, a distance of over 3,000 feet, and we dared not leave the edge of the arete to pass on to it; far upon this face there lay a quantity of fresh snow in a loose and dangerous condition. On our right lay the dreaded cornice.

Suddenly Franz halted. Something seemed to trouble him, for more than once he struck his axe into the snow in front of and beside him without moving forward. He called to me to pay out the full length of rope between myself and him, which I did, and again he advanced a few steps. Then he stopped, and, turning round to me, in slow tones said, "Herr, be very careful how you tread here; take care only to put your feet in the steps I make, for"—and this he added very impressively—"we are in great danger here."

He had hardly spoken—in fact the words were still in his mouth—when I heard a loud crack. It was a sound such as I have never heard before or since, and I can only describe it as being like the grate of a heavy wagon upon frozen snow. Then, without further warning, the side of the mountain seemed to break away, and with it Franz disappeared.

For one second I felt paralyzed. The next, scarcely knowing what I did, but with the instinct of self-preservation strong within me, I sprang to the left over the precipice on the opposite side to that on which poor Franz had disappeared. The rope ran out to its full length, and then I found myself powerless to move, anchored tightly to the edge of the arete, and with a strain upon my chest from the pressure of the rope which was well-nigh intolerable. Burns and the porter had seen what was coming, and had thrown themselves flat, so that when the jerk caused by my leap had come they were well prepared to meet it.

For a few seconds, though, it was a deadlock. Then I heard a faint voice, which seemed to come from Franz, calling for help. Somehow or other, but how I hardly know to this day, Burns so managed to slacken the rope that I was enabled to scramble up on to the arete again, and then the three of us set to work to haul up Franz. It was not an easy matter, but presently an ashen face appeared over the edge, and with some help from himself we succeeded in raising Franz to a position beside us.

He was badly shaken, and the horror of the situation, as well it might, had clearly affected his nerves. Until rescued his life literally hung upon a thread; for he had remained suspended over an awful precipice many thousand feet in height, with nothing but the rope around his waist between him and certain destruction. His face was very white, and a small wound on his forehead, from which the blood was slowly trickling, gave him a ghastly appearance; but there was a strange look in his eyes as he grasped my hands, and exclaimed with all the energy of deep gratitnde—

"Herr you have saved my life. Think not that I shall forget. Mark this. You will one day be in difficulty, in danger; but fear not, Franz will be there, and he will have come to save your life.

He was greatly excited, and it was to this fact that I felt inclined to attribute his words; but yet there was a strange earnestness in the manner he spoke which impressed me deeply in spite of myself, and with an inward presentiment (I can call it nothing else) that some day or other they would inevitably come true.

From what we learned subsequently it appeared that, in spite of Franz's precautions, our upward track had in one place passed over a portion of the cornice. Franz had become aware of this, but in trying to avoid the danger in the descent had brought about the very thing he feared, the touch of his axe having started the great snow cornice, forty feet or so of which doubled up and bounded down the mountain side, carrying Franz along with it. As a matter of fact it was a very narrow escape for all of us; for, had any other member of the party gone through the snow as well as Franz, the others could not have held, and must have been dragged down too. I shuddered involuntarily as I gazed into the abyss into which we should have fallen, and thought that there would not have been left much of us by the time we reached the bottom!

No further incident occurred during the descent, but, from having to go slowly on Franz's account, it was not till late in the evening that we got back to the Riffel.

Two days later I said good-bye to Franz, who seemed to be getting well over his accident, and made my way back to England, leaving Burns to carry on a career of conquest which the admirable weather up to the close of the season gave him every facility for doing.

When I took leave of Franz that time at the Riffel I did not think that I should nevermore set eyes on him. Did I say nevermore? Yes, nevermore, at least in this life.

It was in December of that same year that I heard of Franz's death. He fell a victim to his passion for chamois hunting. It appeared that he had been out one day after a heavy fall of snow, and had perished in an avalanche, his body being swept away no one knew whither. Nothing but his hat and the shattered remains of his rifle, indeed, were ever found of him again, and it was only by their recovery that it was guessed what his fate had been.

To lose Franz was like losing an old friend. Sadly I thought over his many admirable qualities so seldom combined in one of his class. His truth and honesty, his cheerfulness and good nature, his skill, his courage in moments of danger, and then I called to mind that last expedition which we took together, (pity that it should have been the the last!) and how near the end had been that day. To what purpose had his life been spared but these few months longer? And as I thought, of a sudden those words of his came back to me with a force positively startling.

"You will one day be in difficulty, in danger, but fear not, Franz will be there, and he will have come to save your life." Poor fellow! It was scarce worth while to think about it. Unless the grave gave up its dead, Franz could never now redeem his promise.

PART II.

It had been snowing heavily all the morning. Matters were beginning to look serious. Midday among the glaciers in the most awful weather, and not one member of the party in the least conscious of our bearings, was a prospect, to say the least, not very reassuring! A dense mist hanging over us, heavy snow in the sky, heavier snow underfoot, a wilderness of white on all sides and no prospect of any improvement. Such was our position on Aug. 13, 188—.

For five years subsequent to our adventure on the Lyskamm I had not been to the Alps. Increase of work and the dislike of having to get a strange guide in Franz's place had kept me away; but with the old love of the mountains still strong within me, I had gravitated once more to my old campaigning ground. I had engaged no regular guide for the season, for my days for vigorous climbing were over, and I now felt that I must relegate myself to only passes, with perhaps an occasional peak.

I was doing that delightful series of easy expeditions known as the "Tour of Monte Rosa." I had crossed the Weissthor with some friends to Macugnaga, and from there alone with one guide (not quite a wise proceeding, perhaps) I had made my way over the Colle delle Loccie to the little mountain inn in the Colle d'Olen, with the intention of returning again to Zermatt by the Lysjoch. I had thought it possible that I might be able to pick up a man at the Colle d'Olen to make a third on the rope, but on arriving there, to my disgust, I found that no one was available.

I scarcely knew what to do for the best. To attempt to cross the Lysjoch alone with one man was an act of folly I had not the least intention of committing. Of other alternatives one was to send down the guide I had with me to the valley to bring up a companion, (which meant loss of time and expense,) or else to wait where I was, on the chance of some other party bound for Zermatt turning up, to whom I might ask leave to attach myself.

I was sitting sunning myself in front of the inn, and thinking over matters, when a cheery voice hailed me, and who should appear toiling up the stony path leading from the valley but my old friend Burns, whom I had not the smallest idea that I should meet on this side of the Alps.

Burns was now a leading light of the legal profession; he was even spoken of mysteriously as a future Judge, but anything more unjudicial than his manner in the Alps it was impossible to imagine, and to me he was ever the same admirable companion and friend that he had ever been.

He had left a party of friends at the Italian lakes, and had come "to do a walk," as he termed it, in the mountains, and he had brought with him temporarily a young Italian guide named Antoine, and a porter, and he, too, I found to my great satisfaction, was bound for Zermatt by way of the Lysjoch.

We decided, as a matter of course, to join forces. Burn's porter was paid off, and sent home; Antoine and my guide Josef were retained, and the following morning we had started on our expedition.

The weather had become doubtful soon after we had left the inn; but we kept on notwithstanding until well on the glacier, and then, when too late, we had begun to wish that we had had the moral courage to turn back before. For the guides had lost themselves. They were neither of them first rate, and now that difficulties began to thicken they proceeded to lose their heads. In fact, to such a pass did matters come that Burns and myself had to assume all responsibility.

The storm was raging furiously now, not a landmark was visible, and the blinding snow obliterated everything. To add to our troubles, we found ourselves without a compass, the only member of the party possessed of one being Burns, and his he had broken only the day before! We could not thus tell even the direction in which we ought to be going.

I have heard of persons lost in the desert wandering for miles in a circle, so that they came back at last to the very point from which they started.

To those who have not experienced it it is impossible to convey the feeling of utter hopelessness in such a case. It was fated we should feel it on that day; for after many an hour's weary trudge knee-deep in the soft snow we found that our labors had been in vain, and we only returned again to the tracks we had made before. Still, aimlessly as we might walk, it was necessary to keep moving, for to stand still, and for any length of time, meant to perish in that awful cold.

We were white from head to foot with the snow which had frozen upon us, and, had the occasion been less serious, we could have laughed at the strange appearance we presented. Burns had assumed the lead. It had been decided that he should go first on the rope and myself last, Antoine and Josef between us; but, as for knowing where we were, it did not matter much who acted as leader.

On we went, and still on, till the monotony became well nigh unendurable. No change, always the same white waste about us, snow here, there, everywhere, and falling all around more heavily than ever. What was to become of us if it continued? We could not go on walking indefinitely. Hour after hour went wearily by.

The guides began to lose heart, and cried to each other about their wives and children. I, too, began to feel not quite myself. But Burns, firmly as ever, kept plodding forward, forward, forward. I caught myself thinking (as they say drowning men will do) of incidents in my past life, of things which I had failed to do, of things which I had done but which it would have been better had I left undone; and then I thought of a host of minor matters which at such a time seemed positively trivial. Then my thoughts ran on other Alpine expeditions, and of that last one which we had made five years ago.

Strange! The scene of it was close beside us now; for, thought shut out from sight by impenetrable mist, we knew that the mightly form of the Lyskamm was towering somewhere above us, lost to sight among the clouds. Even the day—August 13—was the same. It seemed as if by a strange irony of fate that that scene of our escape might witness the closing scene in the lives of all of us.

Then Franz's words came back to me and, I caught myself saying half aloud; "Franz! Franz! Oh, for one hour of your guidance, and all would be well! Oh, that you could come back to earth to redeem your promise!" And as I yet spoke there was wafted toward us across the glacier a voice clear and distinct even amid the whirl and uproar of the storm, a voice that said, "Herr, I come!"

We had altered our course. Almost insensibly I felt it, but I was equally certain that it was so. I looked ahead. Burns was still leading but no! somehow the order had been changed. I thought that I did not see aright, for I could not remember any alteration being made in our positions on the rope, and yet it was quite certain that it was not Burns who now went first.

I began to count. There was Josef, there Antoine, there Burns, and there—but no, it could not be—there was yet another! I refused to believe it. Twice again I counted, twice with the same result. And then came over me a feeling of dread, for I felt that he who was leading us was not of this life.

I looked and the form seemed familiar—tall and broad-shouldered, and with a decision in its movements that I had never seen but in one guide. And yet, firmly though it trod, the figure seemed to glide over the snow rather than walk. Our pace increased. We seemed almost to be flying across the glacier. Soon we began to mount, the slope grew steeper, then steeper still. We crossed what was clearly a ridge and then began to descend. Onward over the snow we went, till suddenly the clouds lifted, and there beneath us lay the familiar form of the great Gorner Glacier, all rosy with the light of a fiery sunset. We were saved.

We raced down to a patch of rocks on this side of the Gorner. Here the guides threw down their sacks and gave vent to their joy in shouts which woke the echoes of Monte Rosa as they had never been wakened before, while I turned to thank our unknown companion. But he was nowhere to be seen; our party now consisted but of four.

"Well, old fellow, what are you looking so glum about? I'm a better leader than some of us," (and he looked savagely at Antoine and Josef;) "in fact, I'm thinking I'll come out as a guide when all else fails. You'll take me, of course."

It was Burns who spoke. Clearly he had not seen what I had. I said nothing, but I knew my eyes had not deceived me. I felt that those words of Franz's had come home that day; for had he not redeemed his promise?

The Elephant Afloat.

The happy life and untimely death of the elephant Jumbo have made us feel a little better acquainted with these great beasts. Jumbo had twice escaped the perils of the sea, only to fall a victim of a railroad engine. A Calcutta paper thus describes how elephants go to sea:

The hoisting into the air, and lowering elephants into the hold of a ship, is not only an unusual sight to most men, but also a strange experience to most elephants.

They were lashed with strong ropes, slung as far as practicable in slings, hoisted up with cranes with threefold tackels, and lowered into the steamers' hold like bales of cotton. When in the hold, they were placed in pens built of strong teak-timber baulks, bolted to the ship's side to prevent them from breaking loose.

The fear the animals suffered was the only pain they underwent; and by watching the eyes of the poor beasts their terror was very manifest. Tears trickled down their faces, and they roared with dread, more especially when being lowered into the hold, the bottom of which was sanded for them to stand upon. We are told that one timid female elephant actually fainted, and was brought to with a fan and many gallons of water.

At sea it appears that the animals got into a curious habit of occasionally—evidently at a preconcerted signal—setting to work rocking the ship from side to side, by giving themselves, simultaneously, a swinging motion as they stood athwart the ship, the vessel rolling heavily as if in a seaway.

In days gone by it was customary for the servants of the nobility, particularly the gentleman-usher, to attend bareheaded. On grand occasions coachmen also drove bareheaded.

FARM.

Horse Talk by an Old Breeder.

There are a great many troubles with horses which could be cured without difficulty, if they were looked after in time. For instance, a man out in Colorado writes that his colt has two scabs or sores on its ears and they are growing bigger all of the time. No doubt this is the beginning of mange, or they may be caused by rubbing the skin off, and then the flies or other insects would keep them irritated.

The simple and sure remedy for all such skin diseases, and especially for mange, is carbolic acid, or its equivalent found in the sheep dips, particularly Lawford's. For mange the solution should be quite strong and it should be well rubbed in so as to penetrate to the very bottom and reach all of the vermin at work.

There is nothing better to cure flesh wounds and sores than lard with some salt mixed in it. The lard is healing and the salt is cleansing. When there is "proud flesh," as farmers call granulation, then kerosene oil should be mixed with the lard, or carbolic acid, both of which contain the same principle, creosote, and it is this which has the antiseptic effect, that is, the effect to counteract putresence or decay. All sores and wounds should be treated in this way as soon as discovered to prevent pus forming and putrefaction, which may be followed by blood-poisoning. Sores should be washed with castile soap or the discharge will take the hair off and the irritation extend. Putting on salted grease will keep the skin healthy and the hair will generally come in natural, but if not it will come in white and disfigure the animal. When a horse has three spots of white hair on his breast or back it is a sure sign that he has had bad usage. He has been galled and neglected, and it does not speak well of his owner.

Warts and all such excresences may usually be gotten rid of by tying a small cord around them and so cutting off the circulation into them. This is the best way and the surest. When the bunch drops off the wound may be greased over, or if necessary touched with some sort of caustic. It is better to let warts or any kind of tumors slough off than to cut them after being tied. There is danger of the cord slipping off and bleeding taking place, whereas if the knife is withheld there is no such danger.

The teeth of horses often cause them a great deal of trouble, and I have no doubt that the extra teeth called the "wolf teeth" do sometimes affect the nerves of the eyes and lead to blindness or dimness of sight. It is the notion of some horsemen that shying in horses is generally caused by defective eye-sight. In some cases shying horses have been cured of the habit by removing the wolf teeth. It is worth looking after, for a dodger is always dangerous. Driving with blinkers will sometimes keep a horse from shying especially if he shys from side looks. Some horses always do this, and they are the worst. When they see an object ahead which frightens them the driver has some warning, but a side shyer takes one unawares unless, knowing its habit, one is always prepared, and this is seldom the case. Blinds or blinkers will do such a horse good. The horse frightented from some object ahead will do as well and very likely better to have his eyes free. A man should study his horse's peculiarities and be prepared to meet them. Careless driving never is a safe way, for the oldest and safest horse will sometimes get scared.

How Can We Make The Farm Pay?

To the thoughtful farmer this is the question of the hour, and one of vital importance. The past year has been one of exceedingly low prices for all farm products, and it has been only by the most careful management that farmers have held their own, much less realizing any profits from their labors. The new year will be much like the old, in this respect. Wise and observing farmers, instead of being unduly discouraged, will profit by past experiences, and be the better prepared to win success where mistakes and failures have occurred. One way to make the farm pay is to have something to turn into money every day in the year, as nearly as possible. The farmer who grows special crops receives large sums of money when his crop hits well and he happens to find a good market for the same. His receipts necessarily come in periodically. But to the general farmer there must be a steady income to meet the constant demand made upon him. The farmer who makes it a point to sell more than he buys every time he goes to town, will at the end of the year find that he has accumulated quite a nice little sum of money. Too many men think it beneath their dignity to grow or sell anything but the leading farm products. They would not be caught taking any sort of garden truck or poultry products to market, even if they were convinced that there was money in it. To make the farm pay, the farmer must not only plough and sow, reap and mow intelligently, but must market his surplus at the right time. Some farmers seem to have a knack of hitting the market when it reaches the highest point, while a neighbor may have the same crops and just as good, but by selling too soon or holding too long, will not realize more than half as much money from the same area under cultivation.

The Ice Crop.

Do not neglect to lay in a store of ice sufficient to give an abundant supply of this cheap and indispensible luxury next summer. The ice crop represents almost nothing but labor, and labor is usually abundant and cheap in winter. The rudest old building or shed will keep ice just as well as a costly stone or brick building if the ice is well covered, top and sides, with sawdust. Nor does it require a very large pile of ice to carry an ordinary family through the summer. See that the farmers' clubs and grange meetings get a good send-off now for the winter campaign. Winter is the season for harvesting ideas. Let the harvest be a good one this winter.

German photographers have succeeded in photographing a projectile in the course of its flight and some of these photographs show the head of compressed air which precedes every shot. It is said to be this "head" which prevents riflemen from breaking an empty egg-shell when suspended by a long thread. The air blows the shell out of the way of the bullet. We believe that Major Peters, of the Artillery School, Quebec, was the first to photograph a projectile. If so he, and not the Germans, deserves the credit.

RIFT AND SPRAY,

OR,

LOVE AND VENGEANCE AMONG THE SMUGGLERS.

THE MOST FASCINATING OCEAN ROMANCE SINCE THE DAYS OF COOPER AND MARYATT.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE GHOST THAT PARALYZED THE PIRATE.

Gerald had not known how the catastrophe to the boat of the Spray had been brought about—or, perhaps, he would have shrunk little from Ben Bowline, who had been the contriver of it. He would not have been quite able to enter into Ben's views and ideas as to how far you may carry a principle of self defense.

But it was an immense relief to Gerald to be able to leave the deck.

Ben had released him from the gag and put the handkerchief in his own pocket, and when Gerald reached the state-cabin of the Rift, as it was called, he was at once received in the arms of Captain Mocquet, who, while, he rubbed the region of his stomach, exclaimed:

"Sacre, mon ami! I shall call one mortal—what you say—duel that Monsieur Jackson. I do not like de box."

"What box?" said Gerald.

"Dis box," replied Mocquet, as he dealt Gerald a feeble blow in the stomach.

"Oh! I understand. Marie—how is poor dear Marie?"

"She sleep like one mouton; that is, small—what you call him?—lamb."

"Where is he? I will have him up!—I will have him!" roared the voice of Captain Dolan at this moment, and there was a scuffling noise at the hatchway.

"Dolan!" said Gerald.

"Sacre!" said Captain Mocquet.

"He shall yet come on deck. He shall yet fire on the schooner! I have sworn it!"

"He comes!" said Gerald, faintly. "Another struggle with that man! Oh, heaven, direct me. Is he, indeed, or is he not, my father?"

"Hold, Captain Dolan!" was now heard in the voice of Ben Bowline. "We don't believe it!"

"You—don't—believe—it! And pray, Ben Bowline, what is it that you don't believe?"

"That Gerald wrote to the port admiral."

"Indeed!"

"Oh, that's all very well. Captain Dolan, but Martin and I don't believe."

"Martin and you are two mutinous rascals and I will speak to both of you another time. I suppose, though, I may be permitted to go into my own cabin?"

"Well, as to that—"

"Oh, much obliged to you—ha! ha!—much obliged!"

The rapid sound of Captain Dolan's descending footsteps came plainly upon the ears of Gerald and of Captain Mocquet. The latter seized upon Gerald; and, flinging open the sliding-door of the little berth where Marie slept, he dragged him in with him and abruptly closed it.

It was at that moment Captain Dolan reached the cabin.

All was darkness.

Coming out of the faint night-light—which, after all, is ever a sort of light in the open air, and gleaming from the surface of the sea—the darkness of the cabin of the Rift was something very impenetrable and profound to Captain Dolan; and he paused on the threshold as a man might pause on the brink of a well.

He had been very much bruised by his fall down the forecastle hatch As no bones were broken, he had managed to crawl up, with such an accession of savageness and rage about his heart and brain that he was capable of any act of cruelty and oppression.

The crew of the Rift he dared not, he well knew, raise a finger against; so his first idea was to make Gerald feel the weight of his vengeance.

"Hilloa!" he said; "hilloa!"

There was no reply.

"Gerald, I say!"

No answer.

"Skulking, eh? Oh, we will soon put an end to that—oh, very soon! Stop a bit, Mocquet, hilloa! Captain Mocquet, holloa, there!"

All was still.

"So you won't speak, either! No doubt you are both agreed on that. But who knows we won't find a way to make you both speak? Ha, ha! who knows? Come, now—I know well enough that you are both here, so you may as well speak—eh?—eh?"

All the sound in the cabin was the hoarse echo of his own words.

"Oh, very well, very well. Please yourselves, only don't think you will do any good by it. Don't make a rush at me; I am armed—I am armed!"

The idea that such might happen came to the craven heart of the ruffian and he retreated a couple of steps up the hatchway near of the door.

"Hoy! a light here!" he said. "There is one, but it is out. A light here. Hoy! One of the crew brought a lantern down to him and lit it on the steps.

"There you are, sir."

"The Spray, where is she?"

"Oh, she's—why, there she is!"

The report of a gun from the Spray sufficiently answered the inquiry, but it was evident that the shot flew wide of the Rift.

"Keep on," said Dolan, "keep on for the bay, and let her just see us go in."

"Ay, ay, sir."

"This shall be the last," he muttered, as he went into the cabin again, and set the lantern on the table—"this shall be the end of it. No more voyages in the Rift for me. A good round sum—twenty thousand pounds—that will do; and Gerald hanged for piracy. Ha, ha! what glorious news for the admiral; when I tell him! Now, where are you?"

Dolan glared around him in surprise at the empty state of the cabin, and then his eyes fell on the little sliding-door to the berth and he said:

"Very wise that—very cunning. As if, sir, I did not know of that. Come out; come out, I say! How faint I feel! Brandy! brandy! Another drop. This has shaken me—very much shaken me, indeed. Ah, that is the thing."

Dolan had found the case of liquors, and had solaced himself with a deep draught of brandy.

He felt decidedly better, but not more wise in his intellect or prudent in his mind.

"That will do, that will do. I wonder now who invented brandy? Some great genius, I should say; but whoever he was good luck to him say I. But he's past wishing good luck to, of course, for brandy has been invented ever so long ago; so, of course, the worthy individual is dead—dead. Well, we shall all be dead some day, when our time comes; but I don't want my time to come. Oh, no, no! I have made too good a thing of smuggling and of the Rift altogether to want that. I shall be a great gentleman yet, if I look sharp and don't run on any rocks. That's the thing to do. It's decidedly good."

These last words applied to another draught of the brandy.

Dolan, then holding by the table in his cabin, glared about him with a ferocity of expression peculiarly his own and thoughts of murder came into his mind.

"I don't see," he muttered, "why I should be troubled with Mocquet, as I shall be troubled. The sooner he is out of my way the better for me. He will go on shore else, and there will be no end of bother. I am here with him—here alone, except the boy, and I don't care what he says or what he sees. I will have him hung; and Sir Thomas Clifford, the admiral of the port, shall see that even-handed justice is done; and then I will write him a letter—oh, such a letter! Ha! ha!—such a letter! Oh, what a letter that will be! Ha! ha! Oh! ha! ha! Good gracious!"

Dolan very near choked himself with the strained laughter that came over him at the idea of what a letter he would send to Admiral Sir Thomas Clifford. It took him some time to recover, and then he looked at the panel that would slide back and open a way to the berth leading from the cabin, and the deadly hyena-like glare flashed from his eyes again and he plunged his hand in the breast of his apparel as he said:

"Captain Mocquet! Captain Mocquet! I want you, if you please. I know perfectly well where you are and I want you, Captain Mocquet!"

There was no reply.

"Oh, you won't speak. You won't come out and see your old friend, who has transacted business with you for so long. Well, perhaps we will find some way of making you, Captain Mocquet."

The silence was still unbroken.

"Ah, you pretend to be asleep—you and Gerald. You are perhaps thinking that you will resist me—that both of you have got into a sort of citadel, where you are hid, You will find yourselves mistaken. Captain Mocquet, I say!"

Dolan thought he heard a slight movement on the other side of the panel and he dropped on his knees by the table and took a pistol with a long, bright barrel from his breast and leveled it over the table, shutting one eye, as he thought, very slowly, so as to take good aim at Captain Mocquet when he should make his appearance.

"Are you coming? Are you coming, my dear Captain Mocquet? I am waiting for you. There is no danger—not a bit—not a bit. Yet, stop; I want to say something to you. I was nearly forgetting—very nearly forgetting. Will you give me that order for the twenty thousand francs? Eh? Will you give me that and then I will tell you where your little daughter is? Good, that! I will tell him where his little daughter is and then he can have no complaint against me. Ha, ha!"

Dolan was just under the influence of the ardent spirits he had taken sufficiently to have lost his discretion, and to utter aloud his secret thoughts, as well as those which he wished to keep to himself; so that Captain Mocquet and Gerald, by both listening attentively, heard much that otherwise they could only have faintly guessed at.

They did both listen most silently.

Marie slept.

It was strange what a deep slumber had come over the young girl; but it was, perhaps, to be accounted for by the fatigue consequent upon the brief cessation of the ordinary current of life, when she was all but drowned, after the sinking of the Coquette.

Certain it is that she slept soundly—neither the confusion upon the deck of the Rift, nor the firing—both from it and from the Spray—nor the struggle that had taken place with Gerald, when he was forced upon the deck, had sufficed to awaken her.

But in her sleep she had a sort of consciousness of that latter tumult.

The young girl had moaned sadly when the faint echoes of Gerald's voice came to her in her dreams; and she muttered some few inarticulate words and her eyelashes had become drenched with tears.

But the noise had ceased and Marie had slept on as before.

She slept still.

Captain Mocquet and Gerald were close to the panel that opened into the cabin, but they had no notion that Dolan was presenting a pistol to that panel, which, at the caprice of a moment, he might discharge, possibly to the injury of Marie.

Had such a thought as that passed over their minds, they would not have hesitated a moment to sally out and confront him.

As it was, Gerald whispered to Captain Mocquet:

"I had better go to him and speak to him."

"Non—non. I shall."

"Not you, sir! Have you not heard that his threats are directed against you. Me he reserves for some future fate, which will give him more satisfaction; so for the present, I am safe."

Dolan spoke again.

"Now I give you fair notice—both of you. I will have you out—out at once As for you, Gerald, I will—ha! ha!—I will think of you; but you, Captain Mocquet, I may as well settle with at once. Come, now—about that little girl of yours—what will you give? How much—eh? If I tell you where she is, how much will you give?"

The stillness was now unbroken for a few moments and then Dolan cried out in a voice of rage:

"I tell you, Mocquet, if you don't come out at once and speak I will shoot you through the panel!"

"Ah!" said Mocquet, and he made a step forward; but Gerald took him by the arm and drew him back.

"No—no. I will go!

"Non—non!"

It was either her father's voice or Gerald's which at this moment broke through the protracted slumbers of poor Marie. With a sigh she opened her eyes, and her idea was that she was in her own little cot on board the Coquette. It is astonishing how the mind will, without consulting the conceptions, revive what it has concluded exists, without dispute. She forgot, for the moment all that had happened to separate her from the French lugger; or if it directly floated over her half-wakened recollection, it was but like the faint remembrance of a dream.

With precisely a similar action to that she had used while on board the Coquette, Marie stretched forth her hand and touched the brass handle of the sliding door; she drew it open, and glancing from the berth in which she lay, she said;

"Bon jour, mon cher pere. On sommes-nous?"

Now these were the precise words she had uttered when Captain Dolan first saw her in the cabin of the Coquette, while bent upon his plundering expedition among poor Captain Mocquet's lockers.

The attitude, too, of the young girl was the same; and around her waist hung the same bit of edging to her night-dress, which he had noticed when her arm was outstretched to open the similar little sliding door on board the lugger,

The lantern—by which Captain Dolan could see now well about him in the cabin—sent a full ray through a hole in the side, upon the face and form—partially rising from the berth—of Marie. The resemblance to the last occasion on which he had seen her was very complete.

If death itself had breathed with its icy sighs upon the heart of Dolan he could not have been more completely paralyzed than he was at the moment.

The confusion of his intellect was rapid and complete; and he could do nothing but still kneel by the table, and glare at what he could consider to be nothing else than the apparition before him.

How was it possible to be other than a supernatural being who now met his eyes?

There was the girl whom he had met in the cabin of the Coquette—whom he could have sworn he saw go down with the French lugger. There she was, looking just as she did; she uttered the same words, too; and there was the little fluttering lace that hung by her waist. He had happened particularly to notice that.

You might have counted twenty slowly, while Dolan, with parted lips and staring eyes, regarded the fair image before him; and then the agony of his fear, which else would have killed him, found vent in a howl of fright that echoed through the ship.

He fell completely over on his back. He yelled again, and shrieked fearfully. He rolled to his knees again. He struggled half way so his feet.

"Help—help! Have mercy upon me? Ben, Martin! Oh, save me!"

He reached the hatchway on his hands and knees; still yelling for aid or mercy he reached the deck and fell into the arms of the terrified crew, who, hearing such yells and shouts from the cabin, had made a rush to the hatchway to ascertain the cause.

CHAPTER XV.

THE AMERICAN CAPTAIN CATCHES A GLIMPSE OF HIS LOST DAUGHTER.

Once more we take our way to that little bit of beach, on which now the advancing tide was surging, and listen to the words—few now and faint—which were falling from the lips of the dying smuggler. Captain Morton was so deeply interested in everything that had been uttered by Hutchins, in relation to the child that had been saved from the wreck of the Sarah Ann, that the knock at the door of the hut had to be repeated before he paid attention to it.

The dying man heard it, however.

It had all the effect upon him of a summons to the grave.

With a loud cry, he sprang up to a sitting posture in his bed; and holding out his arms before him, as though he would ward something off, he shrieked out:

"No, no; not yet—not yet—oh, not yet! I cannot go; I know you! Oh, spare me yet—for the love of Heaven, and of Heaven's mercy, spare me yet! Let me have time to repent. Oh, not yet! I know you—I know you too well!"

"Who is it?" said Captain Morton.

"Death—death!"

"Nay—you are deceiving yourself."

"No; it is death—death!"

"Death does not come in a material form. Compose yourself and hope for the best. You may still seek for mercy where mercy is infinite."

With a deep sigh the smuggler fell back upon his miserable bed and said faintly:

"Yes—yes."

Captain Morton went to the door, which at the request of the dying man had been closed, although it could easily have been opened from without. The captain flung it open, saying, as he did so:

"Who is there?"

There was no reply from the person seeking admission to the boat-house; but by the dim, very dim light, Captain Morton could see that it was a young girl with a shawl placed over her head and pinned or tied beneath her chin, while the long ends hung down over her shoulders.

"Who are you?" he said again. "Whom seek you here, my girl?"

"Jabez."

"Who is Jabez?"

"Hutchins, sir."

"He is very ill—dying, I think—and cannot see any one. You come from some of the cottages, I suppose?"

"Oh, no—no! I have brought him this."

She produced a little basket over which was a clean, white cloth; and it was just at that moment, while the captain had his hand on one of the handles of the little basket and the young girl still retained her hold of the other that the sullen echo of a gun and then of another came from over the sea, apparently far off.

"Ah!" said the girl, "I fear—"

"What do you fear?"

"Poor Gerald—my poor Gerald! O, God, be good to him!"

The young girl started from the open door of the little boat-house, and then, suddenly pausing, she looked up into the night sky.

A beautiful rocket rose high among the clouds and then bursting, sent down a rain of emerald-colored sparks. It seemed as if some faint reflection from that green rain of light found its way to the fair face of the young girl, for as Captain Morton looked at it he could hardly persuade himself that it was not something more than mortal in its beauty that met his eyes.

A deep and strange feeling came over his heart and he knew not why or wherefore, but the tears rolled up in his eyes and he stepped toward the girl with his arms outstretched, with an impulse to clasp her to his breast which could not be withstood.

"The Rift!" she said, as she clasped her hands. "It is the Rift!"

Another moment and, fleet as a chamois, she was gone. A light flutter of drapery in the darkness and he could see no more of her.

Captain Morton stood on the threshold of the boat-house like a man entranced.

"What is this?" he gasped. "Why am I thus full of agitation? Why does my heart beat so rapidly and strangely and why are my eyes filled with tears?"

He leaned against the side of the old boat.

The tide, with a surging hiss, was laying the beach, and he could hear the wind, with a melancholy, dirge-like howl, battling with the waves in the Channel. He strove to pierce the darkness with his eyes, but all in vain; no trace of the young girl could he discover.

With a deep sigh Captain Morton re-entered th hut.

"I am very weak," he said, "and little trifles move me. It is because I have suffered so much."

The basket that the young girl had brought with her she left in the hands of the Captain, who now placed it on the side of the bed, as he said in a low voice, betraying great exhaustion with feeling:

"Hutchins, here is a basket, I suppose containing some delicacies for you, sent by some compassionate friend or neighbor. Do you hear me?"

Hutchins did not move.

"Try to rouse yourself a little. Here is a basket, I say, which has been brought by a young girl."

The light had got very dim in the hut and Captain Morton could not very well see that awful look of another world which was now on the face of the dying man. It was only in a faint whisper that he could speak.

"Come—come—come!"

"Where? What?"

"Nearer—nearer. Come!"

"Yes."

"I—am—going now! I see the light. God! it is lured and fearful! and yet—yet—"

"Yet what?

"I hear soft voices praying, and they utter my name—even my sinful name!"

"Be comforted."

"Hush! hush! hush!"

Captain Morton was silent; and as the light slowly waned away, and got dimmer and dimmer, he could hear the breathings of the smuggler grow fainter. When the dying man spoke again, it was in a low, faint whisper:

"Did you say a basket—a girl?"

"Yes."

"With fair hair, and so sweet a look—"

"I saw that she was fair, and very lovely."

"God! God!"

"Some neighbor's child?"

With a writhing movement, the smuggler approached close to Captain Morton; and in a strange, spasmodic way, he whispered to him:

"That was the child that was saved from the wreck of the Sarah Ann. Her clothes were marked with the name of Grace Morton!"

Captain Morton cried out aloud:

"My child—my own—my little one! O Heaven! My darling—my Grace!"

"You—you—you the father—"

"I am—I am! I have come from afar over the sea to seek for news of this little one. I am Captain Morton, and you speak of my child!"

"Thank—thank God!"

Boom! came the thunder of a gun at sea; and the spirit of the smuggler fled.

"Speak again—oh, speak again!" cried Captain Morton. "Where is she? Where has she fled? Oh, tell me! One word—only one word!"

All was still. The frantic appeals of the father were put to an insensible clod. Then, with a wild rush, Captain Morton flew from the hut, and cried aloud:

"Grace—Grace! my child! my own darling! It is your own father calls you—your poor suffering father! Grace—my own dear one! my own little one!—do you not hear me? Grace! Grace! Whither have you fled? Your father calls you, to hold you to his heart forever and forever!"

With such shouts and cries Captain Morton fled along the beach and up the narrow pathway that led to the town, and the fishermen and their wives, who had retired to rest, muttered prayers as they heard the frantic cries and the rapid footsteps.

It is long now since we have set foot within the precincts of that sea-girt house, where first we descried the young girl in conversation with the old sailor, who had charge of the beacon ot the cliff, as described in the first chapter of this veritable history.

We now return to that mysterious place.

Joseph and the young girl are no longer on the top the cliff. They occupy a position on a sort of plateau, about halfway down the face of it, and they are both looking out to the sea.

"Come, come, Miss Grace," said Joseph, "I advise you for the best. You will have Mrs. Wagner coming after you soon, and you know her."

"I do know her, Joseph; but I know that I am no longer a little child."

"Well, no more you are, miss, if it comes to that; but you know that your father—"

"I will not call him father, Joseph."

"Well, well, miss, don't then; and I can't say he's much of a father to you. What makes you shake so, Miss Grace, to-night? You don't seem like yourself."

"I hardly know, Joseph."

"Why, now you are crying."

"I know I am. I don't mind telling you. I went, as you know, in the boat to Hutchins' cottage a little time ago."

"Yes, miss; and Tom rowed you along the little bit of coast, didn't he?"

"He did. I went to take him the little basket of things that I always take him once a week."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Empty.

Tramp—Are you the proprietor of this hotel, sir?

Proprietor—Yes.

Tramp—Will you please punch me under the ribs as hard as you can?

Proprietor—Certainly—there, how's that?

Tramp—That'll do. Now, what I'm getting at is, don't yer want to hire me for a perambulatin' dinner-gong? That holler sound would fetch people down from the tenth story.

VARIETIES.

The Welsh title of the aspen is "the leaf of the maiden's tongue."

The standard of education in Spain is very low, but little more than twenty-four per cent. of the population being able to read and write.

Belgian farmers, without any special advantages, have found the production of flax profitable enough to induce them to grow it in increasing quantities for English markets. Russia is the chief source of the flax supply of England, and the British East Indies of the linseed we import.

Prussian state railways have for some time past employed women as guards at crossings. The work consists chiefly of the closing and opening of the bars and the lighting and sweeping of crossings, and the women in most cases are either the wives or widows of guards. Their daily wages are from sixpence to ninepence.

The cock partridge takes a share of sitting on the nest, but when the brood it hatched he feeds some yards ahead of is, and takes care of number one, and leaves his mate to cater for the young ones. Young partridges newly hatched live almost entirely on insects, which the old hen finds for them.

When a bee has filled a cell either with pure honey or a mixture of pollen-dough and honey, and has completed the lid, a drop of formic acid, obtained from the poison-bag connected with the sting, is added to the honey by perforating the lid with the sting. Numerous experiments show that this formic acid preserves honey and every other sugar solution from fermentation.

This pretty story is told with regard to the origin of the Corinthian capital. It is said that a loving nurse had placed a basket of toys, covered with a tile, upon the grave of a Corinthian girl, and that in the spring-time an acanthus plant, upon which it stood, sent forth shoots covering the basket and curling over the tile, thus providing a model which was imitated directly by a celebrated sculptor of the time.

The red clover is a veritable bee-puzzle. Except the ordinary bumble-bee, there are no bees in our apiaries capable of extracting the honey which is secreted at the end of the long tubes of its flowers. To tap the garnered nectar of a red-clover field it is necessary to procure a bee with even a longer tongue than that of the Syrian variety, and such a bee is said to be found only in the East Indies.

Coverings for the foot began with sandals. After these came shoes left open at the toes, then the wooden shoes of the ninth and tenth centuries, followed in the Middle Ages by shoes with long pointed and turned-up toes, which sometimes turned up as high as the knee. Later, a shoe was worn with an exceedingly wide toe—so very wide that it impeded the process of walking. Queen Mary restricted the wearing of this by a proclamation which ran to the effect that shoes should not be worn wider than six inches.

HEART QUESTIONINGS.

BY JOHN IMRIE, TORONTO.

What stirs an emotion
As deep as the ocean,
And strong as the hills that tower above?
'Tis the sound of a sigh,
As the zephyrs go by,
That tells in a breath the presence of Love!

What is seen in the glance,
As true lovers advance,
That kindles a flame which never can die?
'Tis a spark from above,
From the altar of Love,
Dropp'd unerringly down from on high!

As the loving hands clasp,
What is told in the grasp
That quickens the pulse and glows on the cheek?
'Tis "the story of old,"
In that loving enfold,
The language of Love that words cannot speak!

Whence the tones that can thrill,
Without effort or will,
And woo the heart's fond admiration?
They are notes from the choir,
With the golden lyre,
Tuned by Love's sublime inspiration!

Oh! from whence comes the bliss
Of love's first fervent kiss,
That rapturous outflow of feeling?
'Tis a faint echoe given
Of earth's foretaste of Heaven,
By fond hearts their fulness revealing!

Whence the breathings of soul
That defies our control,
Those sweet communings of heart with heart?
'Tis a gift from above,
'Tis the token of love,
Once possess'd, time or death cannot part!

Standards.

The truest and fullest conception of right and duty which a man can form must be his standard for to-day; if he is living a true and noble life, increasing intelligence, wisdom, and love will combine to form a still higher and better conception for to-morrow. We cannot always dwell in an imaginative state, be it ever so pure and good nor would it be desirable. Work of hand and head rightly absorbs much of our time and thoughts. Yet all duty will be better performed for the refreshing air and wide outlook gained by frequently dwelling on the heights—that is, by gaining and cherishing clear conceptions of the right, the good, the true, and the beautiful, and bringing all force to bear upon their still further elevation.

A writer in a recent number of the American Naturalist gives an account of a swallow which set the broken leg of one of its nestlings, and afterwards carefully bandaged it with horse-hair.

MARKDALE, DEC. 2. 1886.

KEEP AT IT.

If a person is engaged in a line of business in which he makes little or no progress, not being particularly adapted for that sphere, the best he can do is to try something else, which his natural abilities are better adapted for. This is dangerous advice taken in a general way, as it encourages a changing from one thing to another and would tend to increase the number who have no settled occupation, and of whom there are already to many in the world.

Of course it is useless for a man to follow the painting business who is color blind, neither will he succeed at music if he has no ear for melody, and in such cases time is only thrown away.

There are thousands of young men in the world starting out in life, and it is of the greatest importance that such carefully find what they are best adapted for, then commence, and continue at it with all his might.

The man of one idea is the man that makes his mark, while he who is, everything by starts and nothing long, seldom rises in position or wealth. The future of the country depends on the young men of to day, and according as their aims are correct and their efforts well directed will the result be.

The man is not interested as much in the future prosperity of the country as in his individual success, and the best way to success is to find our best hold and never let go. Choose an honest calling and then keep at it, you will thus insure ultimate individual success, and a country made up of such citizen cannot but prosper.

Gilray, Esq., reeve of Euphrasia for the commons, and Wm. Brown Esq., of Markdale for the Local House. The canvass for the latter will now be opened in dead earnest, and as the time is short between now and polling day, Dec. 28th we may expect lively times in politics. Mr. Brown's addresses to the electors will appear next week,

TO THE ELECTORS —OF THE— Centre Riding of Grey.

GENTLEMEN:—

The writs for a General Election for the Local Legislature will be issued immediately.

On Tuesday the 21st day of December next, the nominations are to be made and Tuesday the 28th day of December fixed for polling.

Having received the unanimous nomination of the largest and most influential Conservative Convention ever held in the Riding, which met in October last, and having since received the most encouraging assurance, of support from the electors generally, I beg most respectfully to announce that I feel it my duty to accede to their wishes and accept such nomination.

I have been a resident of the Riding for thirty-eight years. During the greater part of that period I have been, more or less, actively engaged in the administration of your municipal affairs and while occupying prominent positions of trust in your County Council I have invariably been guided by a desire to protect and promote your interests.

My long residence in the Riding and practical knowledge of the working of our municipal institutions enable me the more readily to anticipate your special requirements, represent your grievances and obtain relief from oppressive legislation. If elected as your representative, I will endeavor faithfully to discharge my duty by giving effect to wholesome legislation and will advocate a more economical administration of the finances and of the Crown domain. As there is not space in a short address to fully explain my views I shall endeavor to attend meetings in the various Townships of the Riding before the elections and there discuss in detail the various questions now before the people.

In conclusion, I shall advocate equal rights and privileges to all classes and creeds of Her Majesty's subjects. Being a resident of the Riding and like many of yourselves engaged in farming operations, our interests are identical I shall do my best to advance them.

Relying on your cordial and generous support to elect me as your representative

I have the honor to be,
Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
JOSEPH RORKE.

A COUPLE'S SUNDAY TRIP.

Swept through the Rapids in Company With Sadie Allen without Suffering Any injury

NIAGARA FALLS, Nov. 28.—George Hazlett and Miss Sadie Allen went through the whirlpool rapids this afternoon all safe. The start was made at 3 o'clock from the Maid of the Mist landing on the Canda side. The barrel was a similar one to that Hazlett and Potts ran the rapids with last summer. When the barrel containing its human freight reached the maelstrom of the pool it shot right into the centre of the pool and made two or three turns. Leaving the pool it followed the current out towards the Canadian shore and down to the outlet of the pool, where it got into a large eddy where it sailed and bobbed around for half an hour. Some friends were near at hand and yelled out to them when Hazlett opened the small door on the top and Frank Lawson threw a rope from shore, which Hazlett secured and the barrel was towed ashore. After coming out of the barrel they had to tramp about a mile and a half, climbing over brush and boulders to where they could get to the top of the precipice, Miss Allen experiencing more trouble on the tramp after she got out of the barrel than she did in shooting the rapids. She is a young lady about 18 years old, a very prepossessing brunette.

A STRANGE CASE.—Mr. Robert Kissick, of Coulson, Ont., has recently recovered from a remarkable disease—a tumor of the speen with dropsy. The tumor estimated weight about six pounds. His medical counsel gave him no hopes, but Burdock Bood Bitters cured him.

A Thing of Beauty.

In past years the rage at Chrismas time and long before has been the purchasing of Christmas cards for friends abroad as souvenirs. This year a change is taking place. The Montreal Star is bringing out a superb Christmas number, a mammoth paper of wondorous beauty, with twentyeight pages of magnificent illustrations, including a fac simile of the great picture purchased by Sir Donald Smith, at the Morgan sale, New York, at a cost of forty five thousand dollars, about which the curiosity of a whole continent has been aroused. The engraving on the, Star's picture is something of a rare delicacy. Besides the twenty-eight pages of illustrations there are stories, sketches and poems by the best authors. Professor Grant, of Queen's Colledge, has written a powerful article, which every Canadian man, woman and child should read, while there are something from the pen of Professor Roberts, Nova Scotia George Murray, Moutreal, absorbing stories by E. W. Thompson, Toronto, poems by Poet Loureate Frechette and others, together with large 22x28 plate suppliment, said to be the most bewitching crayon ever issued on this side the Atlantic. The whole of this paper, which competent critics say eclipses the London Graphic and London illustrated News is sent to any address for the amazingly small sum of 25 centa in postage stamps. The publishers are Graham & Co., Moutreal, who are giving beautiful prizes to the value of $300 to the little folk who write the most faithful short letter about the paper, This is really the age of wonders. Anybody who was fortunate enough to get a copy of the last Carnival Star will not be so much surprised at this latest piece of gigantic enterprise.

How to Have Good Steak.

We like good steak, and I will tell you how we manage to get it in about twenty minutes after the fire is lighted on a cold winter's morning.

We burn wood. If we didn't we would burn enough to have steak. The fire is lightened in the cook stove, and as soon as the first few sticks of wood burn well down and the kettle is simmering two or three shovelfuls of charcoal are thrown in, and in five minutes we have the nicest bed of live coals one could wish for. The steak is thrown directly on the coals and is turned rapidly with a couple of long toasting forks till done to suit. It is very little cost and less trouble. Charcoal costs only from 15 to 25 cents per bushel, and a bushel lasts a long time for this purpose.

One who has always eaten steak fried in lard in a skillet has yet to learn what good Canadian beef is. The average boarding-house cook has a peculiar rule for cooking steak. When she gets up in the morning she puts a "lump of lard the size of a walnut in a cold skillet, puts the steak in on top of that, and another lump on the steak, puts the skillet on the stove, and then lights the fire." If the fire were lighted first it would break the charm. If you will cook steak in a skillet have it (the skillet) smoking hot, put in the steak without any grease, turn it five times the first ten seconds, and after that turn it often, and you will have a good fair steak; but not as good as broiled on the coals.

An Enjoyable Dinner.

Boiled Leg of Mutton.—Let the mutton hang for a few days (or even a week, in cold weather) before cooking. At the end of that time cut off the hank bone and rub the meat, if necessary, with a clean cloth. Put it into a large saucepan of boiling water; let it boil fast for two minutes, in order to harden the outside and so retain all the juices; then draw the pan on one side and allow the meat to gently simmer until sufficiently cooked. Fifteen minutes must be allowed for every pound and fifteen minutes over. Some persons like small, whole turnips boiled in the liquor with the mutton, and arranged neatly round the edge of the dish for a garnish, while others prefer to have the meat served alone, accompanied by caper sauce.

Caper Sauce.—Make half a pint of melted butter and stir in it two dessert-spoonfuls of finely chopped capers. Taste the sauce, and if not sufficiently acid, add a dessert spoonful of vinegar. Stir the sauce for a few minutes over the fire, letting it simmer very gently, then serve in a sauce-boat.

Potato mold is an exceedingly pretty dish and very easily made. Boil or steam the potatoes in the usual way, then mash them thoroughly with a little milk, butter, pepper and salt; press them firmly into a pretty mould which has been well greased; then turn them out on a dish and place them either in the oven or before a hot fire for a few minutes to get prettily browned. This is a very dainty way of serving potatoes and makes a nice change from the ordinary mashed potatoes.

Mashed Parsnips.—The parsnips require to be well washed and scraped; if large, cut them in two or three pieces and put them into a saucepan of boiling water, slightly salted. Let them boil quickly until quite tender (they will require an hour or perhaps longer, according to their size and age); then remove them from the water, drain, and mash them, and press them through a sieve. Put the pulp into a clean saucepan with two or three tablespoonfuls of milk, or cream if it is to be had, and a small ball of butter, about an ounce, well kneaded with flour. Stir the parsnips over the fire until the butter is entirely dissolved; then turn them into a vegetable dish and serve at once.

Golden Pudding.—Chop half a pound of good beef suet very fine and put it into a bowl with four ounces flour, four ounces of sifted bread crumbs, a tablespoonful of sugar, the grated rind of three lemons, and a pinch of salt. Mix these ingredients thoroughly; then add three well-beaten eggs. If these are not sufficient to moisten the pudding, a little milk may be added, but the mixture must not be too moist or the pudding will be heavy. Beat all briskly for a few minutes; then turn the preparation into a buttered mold. Tie a strong pudding cloth over the top; plunge the pudding into plenty of boiling water and keep it boiling fast for three hours. Turn it carefully out on a hot dish and serve with lemon sauce.

Lemon Sauce.—Put the thin rind of a lemon and three tablespoonfuls of fine white sugar into a saucepan with half a pint of milk. Let these simmer gently for ten minutes; then add the juice of the lemon and an ounce of butter rolled in flour. Stir until the butter is entirely dissolved; then strain it into the sauceboat and serve. Some persons add a glass of wine.

Good Enough to Remember.

To smooth out premature wrinkles, rub best olive oil into them at night on retiring.

To remove the glossy appearance from coat collar and elbows, rub with a cloth dipped in warm water and borax.

A good cement to fasten on lamp tops is melted alum; use as soon as melted, and lamp is ready for use as soon as the cement is cold.

Cow's milk, one quart; water, one pint; dilute hydrochloric acid, half a teaspoonful; mix and boil. The resulting curds are soft and fine as from human milk.

To laundry shirts to give the fine gloss to the bosoms, take of white wax one ounce, spermaceti two ounces, melt them together with a gentle heat. When you have prepared a sufficient amount of starch, in the usual way, for a dozen pieces, put into it a piece of the polish about the size of a large pea, using more or less, according to large or small washings. Or thick gum solution (made by pouring boiling water upon gum arabic) may be used. One tablespoonful to a pint of starch gives clothes a beautiful gloss.

Imitation

Is sometimes called the sincere form of flattery. This may account for the number of imitations of the original and only positive corn cure—Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor. All such fail to possess equal merit, so when purchasing get the genuine "Putnam's." Safe, sure and painless. All druggists.

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

"I desiah to denounce to dis assemblaige," said Brother Gardner as the meeting opened, "dat de Hon. Skyfustus Billington, of New Orleans, am in de aunty-room, an' am waitin' to address us on de subjeck of 'Riches vs. Happiness.' De Hon. Skyfustus has addressed us befo', an' it am needless to 'splain to you dat he knows de bizness of oratory as well as a hoss doctor knows what ails a sick mule. He am rich in wisdom, 'sperienced in philosophy, an' has trabbled mo' miles on freight trains dan any odder orator in de world. Doorin' his address I desiah de silentest quietness. Any pusson found guilty of frowing shucks around will be sot down on wid terrible airnestnes befo' de lodge closes. De Recepshun Committee will now escort de gem'lan in."

The committee left the hall for that purpose, and soon reappeared in company with the visitor. While he was taking a drink of water and removing his necktie, collar and suspenders, the brethren had a pretty good look at him. He sized up two stories and a basement, about 45 years old, knees rather out of true, feet which wouldn't rattle around any in a pair of No. 12s, and a mouth built on purpose for pumpkin pie. He bowed right and left to all acquaintances, ascended the platform with a skip, and at once began:

"My frens, what am riches? You can't tell me. I see by de blank 'spreshuns on your faces dat you can't. Riches, my frens, consists in being rich. If you am rich you hain't poor. If you am poor you hain't rich. Dat's been my 'sperience fur de last fifty y'ars, an' while it has cost me a good deal of money I am willin' to gin it to you fur nuffin.' [Suppressed excitement over getting something for nothing.] We hev seberal men in dis kentry worth more'n $20,000. Dey wallow in riches, but what about deir happiness? Dar must be some consolashun in bein' able to walk into a grocery an' tell de grocer to send up fifty pounds of bakin' powder an' a millyon clothes pins, but does dat rich mogul sleep any sounder dat night den de man who has drank sixteen cent tea for supper? Of co'se he don't! Like 'nuff he dreams of dem werry millyon clothespins, an' in his dreams he am a towel on a clothesline an ebery pin am tryin' to stick him fast. [Grunts of satisfaction from all over the hall.]

"My frens," continued the speaker, as he began to warm up to his work, "de rich man walks on welwet ca'pets, an he sots down on stuffed cheers, an' he has Saratoga 'taters ebery meal. He jist rolls in ham an' eggs, an' he walks all ober fricasseed chicken. De poo' man walks on a bar' floo,' sots on a hard cheer, an' his taters am biled wid the hides on. Yet who am de happiest? You will say de rich man, of co'se, but dat's whar' yer toes turn in. When night comes de poo' man has no fear o' burglars; de noosepapeys hain't gwine ter pitch inter him in de mawnin; his wife hain't gwine to 'lope off wid anybody; his son am not gwine ter be 'spelled from college. He jist sits dar an' eats snow apples an' popco'n, an' contentment drips all ober him. [Sensation, during which Elder Toots became excited and yelled "fire!" at the top of his voice.]

"De rich man w'ars broadcloth!" continued the orator after getting away with another drink, "an' he rides in his keeridge, an' he goes to de opera. You envy him, but what poo' fules you am! All de time he am doin' dis he am 'spectin' dat de small-pox will break out in his fam'ly an' take ebery one of 'em off. De poo' man goes afoot, w'ars plain wollen, and he doan' know what de inside of an opera house looks like. As a reward he nebber has de small-pox nor dipthyria. [Chuckles of satisfaction, during which a raw potato hit Samuel Shin in the neck.]

"On ebery hand you h'ar de 'spreshun: 'Poo' but honest.' Nobody eber says: 'Rich but honest.' It am only poo' folkses who lib from hand to mouth who am honest. Ebery honest sentiment in de human breast teaches us to be poo'. When your ole woman, dressed in kaliker an' w'arin' her last summer's hat, sees a rich lady sailin' past her, harnessed up in silks an' diamonds an' sealskin, she may fur a moment feel envious. But, my frens, when she comes to reflect dat rich women hev to w'ar shoes one size too small, an' stockings wid stripes all up an' down de legs, an' hev dressmakers an' ha'r-dressers an' gin balls an' parties, she feels to pity 'em wid all her noble heart. [Great applause and one hiss, the latter coming from Whalebone Howker, who will get hail Columbia at the next meeting.]

"If I was axed to adwise a young man," said the orator as he straightened out his left leg to clear it of a cramp, "I should warn him agin strugglin' fur too much wealth. It stings like an adder an bites like a sarpint. Riches am de cause of jealousies, envy, an' crimes of all sorts. Dar' can't be no comfort fur de rich man. He am worried about his cloze; his hosses run away; his coachman 'lopes off wid his darter; de bank in which he has got his money am sartin to bust. After he has suffered an' suffered, 'long comes death an' takes him away, an' no sooner am he buried dan his body am stolen by a medical college. [Applause.] All de poo' man has to do am to get in his meat an' taters an' wood fur de winter, buy cloze fur de ole woman an' de chill'en, lay in ten bar'ls of apples an' two of cider, pay up his debts, put a $50 bill in his west pocket an' purceed to take solid comfort an' happiness. [Cries of: 'Yum! Yum!'] Sickness will not come to him—trubble will pass him by, an' he will be nominated fur Alderman in de spring.

"If dar' am any men in dis club who sighs fur riches he am de subjict of my pity. I warn you in my most solemn tones to quit dat sighing. True happiness am wuth mo' dan all de gold eber dug from airth.

"Gem'len, I had intended to incloode de Garden of Paradise in my remarks, an' to bring in de Pyramids, Christopher Columbus an' George Washington, but de hour am late an' I must elongate dis oratory to a prolongated quietus. Wishin' you all possible health an' happiness, I will now determinate my desideratum an' bid you farewell."

IT WAS VOTED.

When the orator had retired Waydown Bebee moved a vote of thanks.

The Rev. Penstock objected. He said the theory of the speaker was all wrong, and that his command of the English language scarcely entitled him to appear on the front platform of a street car.

Nevertheless, upon a vote being taken, the thanks of the club were extended by a large majority, and the meeting then adjourned.

The Beauty of Woman is her crown of glory. But alas! how quickly does the nervous debility and chronic weakness of the sex cause the bloom of youth to pass away, sharpen the lovely features, and emaciate the rounded form! It is one of the greatest boons ever conferred upon the human race, for it preserves that which is fairest and dearest to all mankind—the beauty and the health of woman.

HEALTH.

The Sick Room.

It is no part of my intention to enter into discussion of the question as to who ld undertake the care of the sick. re are none of us who, if we look at the estion candidly, will disagree with Dr. ir Mitchell when he points out how un- e and injurious a thing it is to have the e of a chronic invalid devolve exclusively members of the household. But there many maladies not serious enough in ir nature to warrant their being included a discussion of this kind. Maladies ich, while they may be of short duration, involve a good deal of tact and care in ir management.

I have only a few and very simple sugges- ns to make on this subject; so simple ap- rently that the wonder may be in many ds why I make them at all, and yet for that they are the very things which I ve seen neglected again and again. I do speak unadvisedly. It has been my lot have a larger experience in the care of sick than falls to the lot of most women, I have seen this lack of knowledge in le things displayed even by professional ses.

ast here I beg to say that I mean to se no criticism of trained nurses, a corps women to whom I think too much honor hardly be rendered, and were it left to for every illness of over a week's dura- I should always call in a trained nurse. as one star differeth from another, so do ses, and there is a further distinction to be made between the trained nurse the woman who goes out to nurse. any rate, since it is not possible for y people to have any nurse at all, no will be any the worse for following a directions.

here are few more grateful things for an lid than cracked ice; few more effica- s things in cases of certain troubles of stomach or in attacks of nausea. Yet ple as are the directions which I have n below for preparing this ic , they e found their way into very few formu- l rules for the sick room. I have never them in the text books for nursing, and know that in some of the best training ols they are not known or have not been wn till lately. Old-fashioned southern ple never had to pound or hammer their They used very simple implements—a strong carpet needle and a thimble. h the aid of the needle and by following grain of the ice (the thimble merely pro- ing and giving strength to the finger), ll pieces of ice could be rapidly and noise- ly shaved off. Nothing could be more enient, and, moreover, the fact that the ation is noiseless and rapid makes it one reat importance. Cracked ice can in way be had at any hour of the night or . A lump of it six inches in every ension can be kept in a sick room for lve hours or more by simply wrapping ightly in a piece of flannel or an old ket. The ice, however, should first be shed, so as to be ready for instant use. A n piece of linen should then be put over keep off the lint of the flannel. Then pping it all closely and thickly in flannel, it in a china bowl. Somewhere near the low is best, of course, but almost any- re in the room, unless close to the fire, ece of ice six inches square and thick keep for twelve hours. But I have seen but one or two of these, and they difficult to find. A substitute, though beautiful one, I allow, but very useful sick room, is an ordinary piece of white el, fitted and sewed to the outside of a tumbler, thereby preventing the melt- f the ice. I am indebted to a very old lady for this simple idea, one which k she originated herself. At any rate w nothing more sensible. If one's eye nded by the flannel cover, it would be ble to put the whole inside of still an- vessel of some material which would t as a conductor. Something made wood I should think was the best.

Many times s, and monthly nurses at that, think ave done all that is necessary when ave put the pitcher containing the into some cool place. Oftener than is either just outside of the window or on one of the sashes. Now, we all know milk is a tremendous absorbent, and nine cases out of ten the nurse leaves covered.

I have seen milk kept perfect s way, when next it, without these tions, the same sort of milk became Milk arranged in this way can with t impunity stay all night by the bed- any one who needs it early in the morn- d yet who hesitates to call any one s it when put further away.

Mental Power and Oxygen.

r. William Taylor, now Bishop of Af- s one of she most unique evangelists dern times, He belongs to a class of erful workers. He is a man of practi- se. His field is literally the world. der in California, Australia, India, America, or South Africa, unequalled have attended his labors. He is now go, where he has inaugurated self- ing missions on a very large scale. le laboring in South Africa, he held series of meetings in Graham's . The church was the finest and most commodious structure in the city. It was crowded. The results of the first day's service were unlike what they had been elsewhere.

The next day the leading brethren came to him sadly disappointed, and bewailing their own dullness as the cause of the failure. Mr. Taylor assured them that the real cause was the lack of ventilation in their beautiful church. Said he, "The immense amount of carbonic acid gas thrown out from the lungs of fourteen hundred persons must poison the atmosphere of the church in a very short time. This poison corrupts the blood and blunts the nervous sensibilities of the people, and hence precludes vigorous mental action, produces headache and drowsiness and sadly injures the health. We can't afford to spend our precious evenings there poisoning each other, for that is the very condition that killed the British soldiers in the black-hole of Calcutta. It is out of the question to do any great work without a good supply of oxygen."

The people could hardly realize that their truly splendid church could be defective in anything. But there was no time to stop for discussion, and a daring trustee, whom everybody believed incapable of doing wrong, took a hammer and went through the galleries and smashed a pane in each window on both sides.

"That," says Mr. Taylor, "in effect gave us a receptive people to preach to."

We have been in many meetings where the lack of oxygen was sufficient to account for the deadness of thought and feeling.

LATE DOMINION NEWS.

The North-West Council has passed an ordinance for the destruction of gophers.

An Aberfoyle sportsman on Thanksgiving Day shot a calf in mistake for a deer.

A Jersey heifer at Summerside, P. E. I., sixteen months old, is giving milk and raising a calf.

A young man fishing at Princeton, N. B., recently caught an eel with a mink clinging to its tail.

It has been decided to raise $25,000 for the erection of a new Sailor's Institute at Halifax.

Mr. James Fitzgerald, of Kildare Cape, P. E. I., who is over 100 years of age, is still active, and during the past summer weeded half an acre of turnips.

Five cows belonging to Mr. George Elliott, of Vaughan Township, were recently killed by a Canadian Pacific freight train at a crossing near Woodbridge.

The Fort Macleod Gazette in an urgent appeal for fire protection says:—So surely as there is a town called Macleod, just so surely will a heap of smoking ashes be all that is left of it some day.

A liquor dealer at St. John, N. B., who has been in the habit of blowing horns, and otherwise disturbing the Salvation Army when they pass his place, was rotten-egged recently by a number of young men desirous of teaching him better sense.

During the recent gale a grain warehouse at Eagle, in West Elgin, containing 4,000 bushels of wheat, 1,500 bushels of oats, and a quantity of peas was overturned into the lake, the whole structure dashed to atoms, and every bushel of the contents lost.

John Hale, a miner of Westville, N.S., 68 years of age, recently visited England, and on the return journey, in contempt for the fact that he had a wife at home, married a stewardess on the vessel at St. John's, Nfld. Arriving at Halifax he left his new wife in a private boarding-house and proceeded home. Not returning at the time expected the ex-stewardess instituted inquiries, learned the true facts of the case, and had Hale arrested for bigamy.

The other night a young couple left Whitfield without the knowledge of their parents, proceeded to Orangeville, and were married. The young woman, it seems, threw her clothes out of a window, cut across the fields, and was met by her intended's brother with a rig which drove off. The prospective bridegroom was overtaken a little further on doing it on foot, was taken into the conveyance and all drove rapidly on to the town where the wedding was celebrated.

On the Grand Trunk Railway, near Parkhill a few days ago, about fifteen yards from the railway fence, were found the remains of a human being. The body was decided to be that of a person about fifteen or sixteen years old, and is supposed to have been exposed for about a year. The grass had grown through and around the bones, and all the clothing with the exception of a soft felt hat and the remains of a black coat, had rotted away. Lying near the bones was found a pair of low shoes which had been half soled at some time, and among the rags 15 cents in silver and a wooden pipe were unearthed. No papers, letters, or mark of any kind could be found whereby the body could be identified.

The Knights of Labor of Vancouver, B. C., at a recent meeting passed the following resolution:—"That this assembly deems it contrary to the spirit of our obligation and the constitution of this Order to quietly allow a renewal or increase of Mongolian competition to citizen labor, and that we pledge ourselves as men bound together by knightly principles and obligation to do our utmost to prevent the increase and to lessen the grievance by an active and persistent action against all persons who continue to encourage or employ Chinese. Committees of conference have been appointed, who have met and adopted plans to be submitted to their respective assemblies. It is also suggested that a public meeting be called to give expressions of public opinion in reference to the renting of a new brick building on the corner of Carroll and Water streets to a Chinese firm."

The body of a drowned man was found washed ashore near Cobourg the other morning. He was an elderly man of about 5 feet 9 inches in height, bald headed, with a small quantity of iron-grey hair at the sides and back of his head, and a few hairs of the same color under his chin on the neck. On the body was a pair of heavy worsted black pants, lined throughout, two white shirts and an undershirt. The name on the tag of the shirt was John. He had a black worsted single-breasted vest with four pockets outside, and a pair of No. 9 doubled soled heavy kip top-boots. In his pockets was a bone collar-button and a small pocket book with a brass rim containing a satchel key, but no money. His pants were tied at the bottoms of the legs with twine, and a rope around the waist. He has evidently been a small-sized thin man, not heavily built, weighing about 150 pounds, and is supposed to be an old sailor lost from some vessel. He had undoubtedly been in the water some time, as the body was much decomposed, and was badly battered and bruised by the late heavy gales. The body was buried at the Union Cemetery, and the clothes retained that they may be identified by his friends or relatives. They may be found at the office of Chief of Police Rankin.

Later particulars regarding the capture of Lone Man show that some two weeks ago an Indian appeared at Fort Saskatchewan and presented to Superintendent Griesbach a note from some of the authorities in the south, setting forth his name as Only Man, thas he was a peaceable Indian, that during the rebellion he had lost two horses near Fort Pitt, which he had reason to believe were in the possession of some Edmonton Halfbreeds, and asking Mr. Griesbach to assist in the recovery of the property. Mr. Griesbach ascertained that the Indian's name was Lone Man, not Only Man, and on referring to a list of Indians not included in the amnesty, found that Lone Man figured as one of the party who had murdered Mr. McIver. He was, therefore, held for iustructions from headquarters. On being questioned Lone Man admitted that he intercepted Constable Loadsby when the latter was making for Fort Pitt, and that both of them fell from their horses together, but denied that he shot Loadsby, or took his revolver and belt from him. Since the events at Fort Pitt he has been in the States, and no doubt returned on the strength of the amnesty which was just not quite comprehensive enough for him.

FINE FUN.

Exposed to many a trying situation—The juryman.

Young boys' stomachs are always in apple pie order.

"A carpenter is known by his chips." The gambler ditto.

The more wreckless the management of a railroad is the better the public like it.

Instead of these being the piping times of peace they are the piecing times of pipe—stove-pipe.

Said Tom, when kicked, and valor seemed to lack, "A man can't help what's done behind his back."

Diner—"Waiter, I see you have got turtle soup on the menu. Is it mock turtle?" Waiter—"No, sir; mud."

Why is it that when a man goes out to have a "live" time with the boys he very nearly always comes home "dead" drunk?

A cow entered a church in Western Ontario and drove the choir out. The congregation immediately took up a collection and bought the cow.

Clara—"John, I don't believe you love me any more." John—"Why?" Clara—"You never turn down the gas now when we sit in the rocking chair."

Sam—"Tell me candidly, do you think that I ought to marry the girl?" John—"Marry her by all means. You will not be fooled half so bad as she will be."

"I say, fatty!" exclaimed one gamin to his fleshy companion, "is it yer mudder wot makes yer so fat?" "Naw, of course it hain't!" was the reply; "its my fodder."

Prisoner (desirous of flattering the court)—"I think there is a fine expression in your honor's face." Judge (urbanely)—"So there is, and the fine is $10 and costs."

California has produced a seventeen-inch onion. We hope this esculent will not become popular. The man who eats a two-inch onion can now disperse a crowd without any trouble.

A San Francisco Italian eloped with two girls a few days ago. This is but another proof that the Italian language is the most seductive of all, and this is why the cock of the chicken yard does his mashing in the Italian language.

"Mother," said a little girl to her parent, who takes a great interest in charitable institutions, "I wish I were an orphan!" "Why so, my dear?" "Because I should see more of you; for you are always going to the orphan asylum."

There was once a giddy young beau,
Who thought he a mustache could greau.
He then asked a belle
If she thought it was swelle
And she promptly answered him "Neau."

Bachelor friend (to newly married man)—"Why this dejection, dear boy? Have you suffered a disappointment?" "Yes, my wife can't sing." "Why, that should not distress you; I think you are to be congratulated." "Ah, but she thinks she can."

A young lady singing a sentimental romanza displayed not only extraordinary talent, but a set of enormous teeth. "Ah," said a lady auditor to her husband, "what a grand organ!" "Perfect," rejoined her husband, "even to the key-board in her mouth."

"Jim," said an honest coal dealer to one of his men, "Jim, make that ton of coals two hundred pounds short. It is for that poor delicate widow, and she will have to carry all of it up two flights of stairs. I don't want to overtax her strength."

Why This Perpetual Worry?

I often wonder why some men will help their wrinkles to deepen and increase their baldness by flying into such tantrums when their meals are a trifle late or the buttons are off their shirts. I know a Christian man a "perfesser," a deacon in the church, who makes his wife's life a burden to her because of his ceaseless complaining and scolding about trifles. Do other readers know such husbands? Heaven forbid that one such has fallen to the portion of any reader of this. I call such men vicious. We allow too many trifles to vex and fret us. I once saw a man famous for his mental vigor and great learning swell up and grow purple with rage because—he couldn't find his hat. How easy it is for a man to make a family wretcehd by his habit of whining and complaining and scolding. Life is too short to waste any of it in such useless mouthings.

Knew Him Too Long.

"What do you thnik of such a man as Jones?" demanded Smith as he met an acquaintance on the street.

"I dunno—why?"

"I've known him for twenty years, and yet when I wanted to borrow $10 he demanded security!"

"Ah! you should have struck him nineteen years ago!"

YOUNG FOLKS.

Star Showers.

Every boy and girl is familiar with the wonderful spectacle which the sky presents twice a year, when the heavens appear to be filled with falling stars, and bright lines of light cross each other in endless succession, until it seems, in the poetic imagery of the Bible, that the stars of heaven are raining down upon the world "as a fig tree castest her unripe figs when she is shaken by the wind." Many a grown-up person has sat up through the night watching the impressive spectacle, and it is likely enough that Prof. Davidson will again be persecuted this year by inquiring crowds who will want to watch the rain or star dust from the vantage ground of his observatory.

What falling or shooting stars ar where they come from, what becomes of them, what relation they bear to meteorites, what connection, if any, they have with other denizens of the skies, are questions equally interesting to scientists and to the public. Dr. Herbert A. Newton, the famous Yale professor and the retiring president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, chose the subject of Meteorites to be the theme of his recent annual address. He summed up all that we know, and he touched upon the numerous theories which scientific men have advanced, but which have not yet been confirmed by observation or reasoning.

All sorts of opinions have been held about the origin of meteors. It has been argued that they come from the sun, from the moon, from the planets, from volcanoes on the earth. Some have argued that they were condensations of nebulous matter left over so to speak, when the world was created. Others have supposed they were fragments of a lost planet. Few of these theories will stand the test of investigation. It is difficult to believe that any solid body—and we know that meteors are solid—could have been projected from the snn to the vicinity of our earth. It would necessarily have been fused and vaporized in passing through the enormously heated atmosphere of the sun, and if it had escaped this peril it would, under the law of gravitation, have shot upward a certain distance and then fallen back whence it came. So far as we know, none of the lunar volcanoes are in a state of activity. Meteors cannot have been ejected from terrestrial volcanoes, for none of them possess the energy necessary to throw a mass of metal a hundred miles into the air. There is no probability that they once formed part of a lost planet; it is difficult to perceive how the materials of a planet, once gathered together, could have been dispersed. After reviewing all these various theories, Prof. Newton comes to the conclusion that meteors, fireballs, shooting stars, falling stars and comets all substantially belong to one class—that they are aggregations of primitive matter which formed somewhere in the cold of space.

The elements are known. Almost every boy has picked up in the fields a curious metallic stone, which he has taken home to be told that it is a meteoric stone, which the ancients called Jove's thunderbolt. This stone, when analyzed, is found to consist of silicon, magnesium, iron, nickel, a little oxygen and a few other materials. Prof. Newton supposes these elements to have been floating about in the night of space and to have come together—how he does not explain. He assumes millions upon millions of such aggregations to have taken place in all parts of the universe. The aggregations may be of any size; from a great comet, nearly as large as a planet, to a stone which a boy can hold in his hand.

The moment a solid body came into existence by these aggregations it obeyed the law of the universe and began to travel toward the sun with cometary velocity. It must go round the central body of our system and thence return whence it came, moving in a parabolic orbit. It starts from a point in space so cold that the severest Arctic weather seems torrid in comparison, but in the course of its appointed revolution, when it approaches the sun, it passes through a region whose heat glazes its surface and gives to meteorites the shiny, wrinkled aspect which the inside of an overworked cannon wears after a long battle. What adventures it has on the way it is easy to conjecture. When it approaches within the attraction of one of the planets its course is run. It cannot but obey the law of gravitation. Down it must come. As it enters the atmosphere of a planet the friction is generally more than it can bear; it breaks to pieces or fuses. Sometimes we see it fall apart, what was one shooting star becomes two. Its light is almost invariably extingnished at a considerable distance from the earth, showing that its life ended there.

Prof. Newton thinks that the meteors we see are seldom further away from us than 100 miles and seldom nearer than thirty miles. Prof. Olmsted reckoned that the great meteor which created such a scare in the East twenty years ago, was over 2,000 miles away, and the meteor of 1885, which was seen simultaneously in Pennsylvania, New York and Western New England and Canada, was supposed to be as distant. But it is impossible to take accurate astronomical observations of a phenomenon which is unexpected and generally instantaneous; it may be that Prof. Newton is right.

According to the ordinary reckoning, 5,000 meteors fall on the earth every year, the great bulk of them, of course, falling into the sea. This ismere guesswork. The data are entirely wanting on which to base an estimate. The size of meteoric stones which are preserved in museums varies from a ton in weight to the size of a child's marble.

The stones which do fall generally come from fireballs or bolides, which are seen to explode with a great noise and smoke. The explosion is sometimes heard 100 miles away, and the concussion of the air shakes the whole region like an earthquake.

There is probably no general law on these matters. Most of the meteorites that have been found were red hot, or nearly so; but one fell in the Punjab a few years ago which was so icy cold that the fingers of those that touched it stuck to the surface. Scientific men explained this on the theory that this one had just come from the uttermost distance of space, where the sun's rays have no power.

Some philosopher, arguing that life was omnipresent, once raised the question whether meteors and acrolites could be inhabited by a race of beings specially created so as to be adapted to their conditions. But the microscope fails to show the least trace of either animal or vegetable life on these visitors from the outer world. The planets may be inhabited, though it is hard to understand how. It is known that if the planetoids contain human beings they must be sixty feet high. But it is pretty safe to say that nobody lives in a comet, which alternates between a heat that fuses metal and a cold that no imaginable thermometer could record; and which, moreover, has the awkward habit of splitting up into two or three pieces on slight provocation.

But, inhabited or not, we must believe that all space is full of oojects, moving in endless procession round the sun. Of these the great bulk are minute particles, star dust, which sometimes get within the earth's attraction and give rise to the showers of dust—red, black and yellow—that have fallen from time to time on the surface of the earth. But a goodly number of them are ponderable bodies, some of them quite large—little worlds in their way—all moving madly through space at a rate which takes the breath away to think of. Prof. Newton thinks that these bodies are within a couple of hundred miles of each other—within speaking distance, so to say—and that millions of them drop out by the wayside through planetary attraction, leaving room for their successors; for the work of creation is never ending—it is, and was, and ever shall be.

How Soult was Outmanœuvred by Wellington.

While Wellington and Soult were manœuvring, the one to pierce the Pyrenees, the other to prevent him from doing so, the duke on one occasion thought it necessary to make a forced march that he might anticipate the enemy in securing for himself a certain position. In the course of this march the troops became ragged and straggled, and an attack by the French would have been an awkward matter. The duke, however, says Sir Francis Hastings Doyle, in his recently-published Reminiscences, gave his orders with perfect coolness, and then went on to say, "Now I shall go to bed." 'To bed, my lord?' was the somewhat anxious comment. "But what if the French attack us during the night?" "Oh, dear, no," he said—"we are are quite safe from attack till ten o'clock to-morrow morning!" The troops as they came up were properly disposed of, the requisite preparations made and everybody looked out for the coming ten o'clock. Accordingly, just as had been predicted, shortly after that hour the French made their appearance in force, and endeavoured to wrest from the British troops the advantage gained by that successful march. They were however baffled and driven back. General Alava ventured to put this question to the duke—"Might I ask, my lord, how you knew that the French would not attack us till ten o'clock in the morning?" "Oh, certainly!" was the answer. "As we were riding through such and such a pass, did not you see three French vedettes gallop off as hard as they could?" "No," said Alava, with his eyes and mouth wide open. "But I did," retorted Wellington; "and I felt at once what would happen. Those fellows went off and reported to Soult that they had seen me their in person, and I knew Soult well enough to be sure of his course. He would summon a council of war as soon as possible and tell them, 'If Lord Wellington is there in person, he must have got up his reserves. Before attacking him I must get up mine;' and, as for his reserves, I am quite certain that they could not be got up to act against us till ten in the morning, therefore I took things easily and went to bed." The sequel shows a singular coincidence. Sir Francis was repeating this story in the common room at All Souls one evening, old Sir Charles Vaughan, the ex-ambassador, being present. "Ah, yes,' he remarked, "I know that story as well as you do; and what is more I can cap it for you! I was telling it some years ago at a Paris dinner. A French general one of the party, on hearing it, looked for a moment rather sulky and discomposed, and at last broke out as follows—'Yes, indeed, for I was second in command on that occasion; and those were Soult's very words.'"

PEARLS OF TRUTH.

The joy of the spirit indicates its strength. All healthy things are sweet-tempered. Genius works in sport, and goodness smiles to the last.

Parents and teachers would do well to remember that permanent deafness has been caused by such a homely reproof as a box on the ear.

If sleep be thorough, a short spell will do more good than a much longer duration of sleep that is incomplet and imperfect both in its nature and in its effects.

Not uttering what is false or doubtful is but a small part of real truthfulness; deceit may consist in concealing what ought to be spoken, in exaggerating or diminishing with a purpose, in seeming to agree when there is no agreement, in feigning sentiments which are not felt.

It is the experience of every true worker who has taken a summer vacation that the satisfaction of getting back to work once more is more substantial and lasting than the pleasure of a holiday, though less intense. Recreation is but an aside in life. Employment is the source and means of content.

Nothing is more humanising and elevating than the love of flowers and trees. Ridicule it as some men may, there is profit in what they call mere sentiment. When the trees which bear luscious fruit cease to be beautiful, and when nature becomes badly utilitarian and too miserly for the production of anything but sordid necessaries, then may man follow. He may shut his eyes to beauty and his ears to melody.

Perfectly Reckless.

"I'm a desperate man. I don't want to live. If I had enough money to buy a rope I'd go—"

Barkeeper—"If you had money enough to buy a rope you'd go and hang yourself!"

"No, I'd tell you to take a drink at my expense."

Too Long to Wait.

Young Tom Anjerry asked his tailor the other day when he would send him the suit of winter clothes that he had ordered.

"When you have paid me for your last spring's suit," replied the tailor.

"Oh, bother!" said Tom, impatiently, "do you suppose I can wait forever for my winter clothes?"
